Yet the words of these two poets show how deceptive the concept of "folkishness" can be. Much of the humor and charm of Manger's ballads derive, not from their simplicity, but from their wicked juxtaposition of cultivated European ideas and forms, with the idiomatic usage of marketplace Jews and worn coin of fairy tales. Steinbarg, whose unyielding perfectionism kept his work from publication throughout most of his life, achieves spectacularly witty and dramatic effects under the guise of spontaneous narration. Paradoxically, the neo-folk poets are the most refined of all modern Yiddish literary craftsmen.

Steinbarg was born in 1880 in Lipkany, a small Bessarabian (Romania) town. Like his cousin, the Hebrew author Judah Steinbarg, he became a teacher, and he directed the Hebrew-Yiddish school of Lipkany until 1929. (The current Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC) exhibition Splendor and Destruction has the story of Lipkany before World War II.) Steinbarg was known primarily as an author of meshalim, or parables, which became quite popular in eastern Europe in the 1920s through the dramatic public readings of Herz Grossbart.

At the time of his death in 1932, Steinbarg was a leader of the cultural activities of the Jews of Czernowitz, Romania. His book of parables, Mesholim, was published a few months after his death.

A desire to 'mend the world'

Steinbarg came under the influence of a teacher steeped in Kabbalah. He received a rich Jewish education. He acquired the knowledge of Russian literature and European modern philosophy on his own, chose teaching as his profession, and was for many years director of the Hebrew-Yiddish school in Lipkany, his beloved shtetl that was the town of his birth.

In 1920, at the age of 40, he moved to Czernowitz, where his house on Negruzzi Street became the symbol of Yiddish literature. In 1928, upon a call from the Jewish community of Rio de Janeiro, he moved to Brazil and served as director of a Jewish day school. In 1930, he returned to Czernowitz, feeling that he could not find in Rio de Janeiro the proper climate of Yiddishkeit so necessary for his creative spirit.

I.L. Peretz's home on Zegliana Street in Warsaw and Steinbarg's home in the attic on Negruzzi Street in Czernowitz were the homes and symbol of Yiddish culture. Both represented the fountain of Yiddish literature, and both writers were responsible for it within the border of their countries.

Peretz and Steinbarg were very different in temperament. Peretz was called the Eagle, Steinbarg, the Dove.

The trend of assimilation of Brazilian Jewry was a decisive factor in his return to Czernowitz. Immediately upon his return, he started his activities as a literary critic in the periodicals of the Yiddish literary scene.

For those who understood and enjoyed Yiddish literature, and appreciated the importance of I.L. Peretz's contribution and influence on the cultural Jewish life in Poland, Steinbarg had the same importance and prestige – 20 years later – within the Jewish cultural life in Romania during the years immediately following World War I.

The first volume of Steinbarg's fables, published in 1921, was an instant success. The artist, Arthur Kolnik, enriched the volume with his drawings. It was a "deluxe" issue. One of the best known Romanian Jewish authors and literary critics, Barbu Lazareanu, wrote in Dimineata (The Morning), the prestigious Bucharest daily: "Finally, we are in the presence of a classical Yiddish literary work without precedent in Romanian literature!"

In 1932, when Steinbarg's Mesholim were collected and published a few months after his death, the book became a bestseller. It was translated into Romanian in 1947 and into Hebrew in 1954, and in part, into German, French, Hungarian, Polish and English. A volume of Steinbarg's short stories was published in Czernowitz in 1936 and a supplementary volume of fables was produced in Tel Aviv in 1956.

Steinbarg's fables are not rehashed moral precepts set in rhyme; they arise out of an original view of the universe. He is the outstanding master of the Yiddish fable in both content and form. He does not rebuke fully or satirize temporary foibles, but rather, gives expression to his own pessimistic vision of man and his destiny. The basis for his social themes is his recognition of man's search for the ideals and joy of life, for happiness. He enriched Yiddish with new idioms and with reshaped proverbs. His plots and rhymes are occasionally comic in spite of his serious theme.

The last stanza of The Bayonet and the Needle is a good illustration:

[B]ut now the needle starts to laugh, and it may still be laughing yet,
with ha, and hee, and ho ho ho:
"When I pierce linen, one stitch and then another, lo –
I make a shirt, a sleeve, a dress, a hem.
But people, you can pierce forever
what will you create from them?"

(Translated by Curt Levant, Voices within the Ark: The Modern Jewish Poets, Avon Books, New York, 1980).

Steinbarg's Mesholim are not in Krylov's style of fables with rhyme and life-wisdom. They, rather, spring from an inner feeling for justice and desire to "mend the world." As a Bund member, his heart was always with the working people.

Steinbarg's Mesholim are at times not only in the spirit of the Proverbs (Mishlei), but rather, closer to the wisdom of Kohelet. Steinbarg's greatness and uniqueness stands, not in his teaching of ethics and morals only, but in his enriching the Yiddish language with a new rhythmic sweetness. His language raised Yiddish to the highest lyrical beauty.

To this date, the Yiddish Scientific Institution of New York (YIVO), lists a total of 22 editions published with hundreds of Steinbarg's fables, poems and songs. Pre-eminent are his poems for children and youngsters. His first book was published in 1921. The last one was published in 1977 in Rehovot, Israel.

The Israeli artist Nahum Guttman illustrated two books, one in Hebrew, in Israel in 1954, and one published in Yiddish, in Montevideo, Uruguay, in 1970. Essays and literary critics on his work have been published in numerous Yiddish literary journals, and in English, French and Hebrew literary journals as well. University professor Dov Sadam, the well-known Israeli critic, wrote: "Steinbarg's work is a call for loving kindness and joy to fill in every human soul" (Eliezer Steinbarg: Mesholim (Fables) Introduction. Published in Tel Aviv, 1969, by I.L. Peretz Publishing House).

Steinbarg died on March 27, 1932. He was 52 years old. Fifty thousand people attended his funeral, Itzik Manger among them. Czernowitz was mourning her finest literary figure. The Romanian Jewish community lost a unique poet and a unique Jew.

On his tomb – a large stone – is engraved (the work of his friend, the artist, Arthur Kolnik) the following stanza from one of his fables:

"Fellows, sad, mournful is that broad capacious world,
Bitter! Let's delight ourselves with a fable

(my translation from Yiddish)

These words express Steinbarg's legacy, his ethics and his vision.

Back to Berlin

Up till now, Ignatz Bubis, chair of the organization of German Jewry, has been the high-profile representative of our people. He has recently been rivaled by a famous person who returned to Germany from the United States some months ago. He is Michael Blumenthal, who was U.S. secretary of the treasury from 1976 to 1979, under then-president Jimmy Carter.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

A native of Germany, born near Berlin in 1926, young Blumenthal emigrated with his family in 1939 to Shanghai, one of the few places to which Jews still were admitted.

Eventually the family landed in the United States, where Blumenthal made his way in spectacular fashion, and gradually reached the inner circle of American politics. Now, some 20 years later, he has returned to the land of his birth and has accepted the post of director of the new Berlin Jewish Museum.

I do not know Blumenthal personally, but I certainly know a good deal about his family, some of whom belonged to the most distinguished figures in German Jewish history. Amongst them were Rahel Varnhagen (1771-1883), who was perhaps the best known Jewish figure in the early days of German Jewish emancipation. Another well-known member of the family was the composer Giacomo Meyerbeer (1791-1864), who became all the rage in Paris in the early part of the 19th century.

Blumenthal recently published the history of his family in a book that has quickly reached bestseller status in Germany. He not only comes from a distinguished family, but its members also have good genes. His father died in San Francisco at the age of 101.

The Berlin Museum that Blumenthal hopes to develop is located in the renovated centre of Jewish life in Berlin. Here stands the famed New Synagogue, whose cupola dominates the Berlin skyline, and here also are located the offices of the Berlin Jewish community. The museum will no doubt add to the attractions of resuscitated German Jewry, once it reaches its full potential.

"German visitors to the museum," says Blumenthal, "will learn once again what German Jewry was once about and what they lost." In his efforts to make the museum a central attraction for the city, Blumenthal will have the help of Jeshajahu Weinberg, the director of the Holocaust Museum in Washington.

What are Blumenthal's first reactions to living in Germany? He says: "At first sight a relationship between Germans and Jews is almost nonexistent.

"What astonishes me is the fact that when I come to Germany I come as an American, but, when I leave, I leave as a Jew. Doubtlessly, it will take yet another generation before the Germans will really come to terms with their past."

Apparently, it is Blumenthal's intention to help them achieve this goal. Indeed, if he can manage the transition from secretary of the treasury of the United States to director of Berlin's Jewish Museum, everything is possible.

Eurovision puts the world on hold

Forget about the makeup of the new government. Forget about whether Ehud Barak is off to a good start as prime minister-elect. Forget about the current drought. Forget about Arieh Deri and the growing power of Shas.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Forget about the deepening divide between the secular and the Orthodox. Forget about the continuing carnage on the roads. Forget about the quagmire in south Lebanon. Forget about the increasing prospects of Israel surrendering the Golan Heights to Syria. Forget just about everything dominating the headlines here on any given day.

Well, almost forget. Admittedly, in the land of incessant reality bites, it's impossible to totally block out the news for very long. But for a while there, just over a week ago, many Israelis came pretty close to such temporary relief.

The improbable cause was a quaint European song contest. To be sure, Eurovision, which is held every year in late May, is an already well-established fixture on the Israeli calendar. But this time around, interest in the event reached a near fever pitch as it was hosted in Jerusalem, with Israel the defending champion.

As the performers and delegations from the other 22 countries competing began arriving in Israel, along with hundreds of foreign journalists who came for the event, the local media were rife with Eurovision-related stories. This was clearly a Major Event. Only a king's ransom or the mightiest of inside connections could get you tickets for the big show. Even tickets to the three dress rehearsals were extremely hard to come by.

Israel was squarely in the grip of Eurovision mania. Maybe it was relief from the insufferably long election campaign the country had just endured. Maybe it was the weeks of advance hype and media coverage (especially on Israel Television that was producing the show) that helped account for the public frenzy surrounding the competition.

There was great speculation about how Israel's entry, a male group called Eden, would fare. No less important, was how the Jewish state, as the hosts of this year's Eurovision, would look in the eyes of the anticipated 150 million TV viewers in 30 countries watching the event.

Many of you must be scratching your heads in bewilderment, wondering what's all the fuss over a song festival. Especially one so often derided as a monument to kitsch, glitz and musical mediocrity. You obviously have not spent much time in Israel in late spring.

Regular readers of this column may recall that a year ago, I wrote about the massive euphoria and swelling of national pride triggered by Israel's victory at the 1998 Eurovision in England, thus winning the right to host the event this year.

This being Israel, even such a seemingly innocuous event like Eurovision, is not immune to the country's socio-political forces. Hours before show time, extra police and border guards were deployed to seal off the area around the International Convention Centre, site of the event, to protect it from furious haredi Jews who had threatened to prevent a final dress rehearsal from taking place on the Sabbath.

Eurovision had already earned the wrath of the haredim because of a planned performance by Dana International, the transsexual who captured the Eurovision title for Israel last year. International, born Yaron Cohen into a traditional Yemenite family, was vilified by the haredim for her sex change operation.

In the end, the evening went off without a hitch. Israel may have finished in fifth place with its song, but it scored top marks for its production of the three-hour extravaganza. It broke several TV ratings records in Israel.

Between 10:30 and 11 p.m., 52 percent of Jewish households were tuned in to Eurovision. By comparison, 12 percent were watching the series Chicago Hope on Channel Two.

The high point of the event won by Sweden, was not the 23 songs, few of which I'd ever want to hear again. Most spectacular was the view of Jerusalem presented at the beginning of the broadcast. The city has never looked so breathtaking as it did in the filmed sequence that featured a nocturnal procession of dancers prancing past the city's landmarks aglow in special lighting. Israeli talent was also on view between songs as organizers offered a creative mix of first class animation and video of biblical and modern-day scenes of Israel.

Eurovision offered a welcomed respite while it lasted. Now it's back to the hard-boiled reality of daily life. At least until a Saturday evening late next May when you can be sure much of the nation will be glued to their TV sets watching the 45th Eurovision live from Sweden, rooting for Israel's entry to return home triumphantly.

Forming a new Israeli consensus

The results of the elections showed that despite hoopla, the creation of a Centrist party was not the prelude to a revolution in Israeli politics.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The head of the party, former Defence Minister Yitzchak Mordechai, dropped out of the contest for prime minister at the last minute, after polls showed that he had almost no support. The party received six seats (five percent) in the 120-seat Knesset. When measured against the expectations, this was hardly a success.

However, in other ways, the election outcome marks a major change. Ehud Barak defeated Netanyahu by a wider margin than expected – 56 percent to 44 percent, and this was the greatest difference between the major candidates and political blocks for almost two decades. It would seem that in this election, the stalemate was broken with a clear victory for Labor and Barak.

However, upon closer analysis, the picture is far more complex, and the stalemate in Israeli politics remains. In the first place, Barak's victory was primarily a rejection of Netanyahu's personality and divisive governing style, rather than an endorsement of different policies. Unless Barak learns to be a team player, he could also find himself out of a job in a few years.

Furthermore, analysis of the Knesset vote shows that the divisions in Israeli society are wider than ever. Shas – the Sephardi haredi party headed by Arye Deri, who was recently convicted of corruption – received a record 17 seats, making it the third largest party in the Knesset. Shinui, a party headed by a coarse journalist whose platform was based entirely on anti-religious hatred, got 6 seats.

A record 15 parties will be represented in the new Knesset – including two Russian and three Arab parties. This tribalism is not the basis for stability or a foundation for the consensus necessary for making the difficult decisions.

At the same time, the two major parties – Labor (renamed One Israel) and Likud – continued to lose support. Likud went from 32 to 19 seats (only two more than Shas), and Labor has 26 seats. Ehud Barak may have defeated Netanyahu by a wide margin, but he will need the support of many smaller parties in order to govern.

However, there are some signs that Barak seeks to avoid the type of narrow governments that trapped both Benjamin Netanyahu and the late Yitzhak Rabin.

Barak has the opportunity to turn the very weakness of Labor and Likud into a strength, forcing them to work together for their own survival.

The new prime minister is seeking to put together a new kind of coalition, in which no single party will be in a position to dictate terms or hold the government hostage by threatening to withdraw. Shas may have 17 seats, but if Barak can create a coalition of 80 MKs (including Likud and the National Religious Party), the power that any one party can wield will be limited.

Similarly, the militantly anti-religious Shinui party will probably find itself outside the government, along with the radical Arab parties and the far right.

A wider government will also help keep Labor's old-guard and power brokers away from state funds and political power. With so many coalition partners, many Labor politicians, including Shimon Peres, Yosi Beilin, Haim Ramon, and former treasury minister Shohat will have to settle for limited roles. Barak may have done well in the elections, but their party did not.

Thus, in this way, a major realignment in Israeli politics may emerge after the elections. The core, based on a Likud-Labor alliance, can form the foundation of a strong government, which can make and implement difficult decisions facing Israel. On the basis of consensus, Barak can lead a united Israeli government into negotiations with the Palestinians and with Syria. Concessions will be accepted, where justified, but Barak will also have strong support for holding firm when Israel's vital interests are at stake.

Domestically, Barak knows that he cannot afford to alienate the entire religious and traditional population, whose strength continues to grow. The alliance between the moderate Meimad religious party and Labor was a small step in this direction. By incorporating members of this community into the decision making process, without giving each party a veto or access to the public treasury, the new prime minister can also help bring the religious into the mainstream of Israeli political life. Such a consensus-based coalition will be able to start narrowing the religious-secular divide, without allowing the extremists on either fringe to block the process.

To make the most of his options, Barak will have to display considerable leadership, making clear and sensible decisions, and then defending them before the public. If Barak provides this leadership in addressing the critical national issues, both foreign and domestic, he should be able to sustain the optimism that emerged after the elections.

The Kirshner File

Birobidzhan: the failure of a Soviet Jewish homeland

Popularly known as Birobidzhan, the Jewish Autonomous Region was formally established by Josef Stalin in May 1934 as the supposed national homeland of Soviet Jewry.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

A backwater in a sparsely-populated area of Siberia, it was designed with the express purpose of creating a territorial enclave where a secular Jewish culture rooted in Yiddish and socialist principles could thrive. Its creators also hoped that Birobidzhan would be a shield against Zionism and resolve a variety of problems besetting Jews in the Soviet Union.

Though it still exists, albeit in a straitened fashion, Birobidzhan was a signal failure in social engineering, never attracting significant numbers of Jewish settlers. In 1939, Jews constituted barely 20 percent of its population. By 1989, when the Soviet Union was on the brink of dissolution, the proportion of Jews had dropped to under five percent. Given the fact that 800,000 Soviet Jews have emigrated in the past decade, one can safely assume that the percentage of Jews in Birobidzhan has still further decreased.

As Robert Weinberg observes in Stalin's Forgotten Zion (University of California Press), a useful primer on the subject, Birobidzhan was the culmination of a Communist party effort to solve the so-called Jewish problem.

It was an unlikely project. Before the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution, both Vladimir Lenin and Stalin had vehemently argued that the Jews were not a nation, lacking the prerequisites of nationhood: a territory and a common language. Indeed, their solution to the Jewish problem had been assimilation, the integration of Jews into Soviet society.

Why, then, did Moscow opt for a Jewish homeland in the wilds of the Far East?

Under the impact of war, revolution, civil war and pogroms, the Soviet economy descended into chaos in the 1920s. Concerned about the dire economic straits of the Jewish masses, the government encouraged their settlement on the land. By transforming them into farmers, Moscow assumed it could change the occupational profile of the Jews, the majority of whom were in petty commerce, retail sales and small-scale handicraft production.

The idea was not new. The czars, from Alexander I onward, had half-heartedly attempted to "normalize" the socio-economic profile of Jews. But by 1914, only some 50,000 Jews (or three percent in the Russian Empire) were tilling the land.

The Communists thought they could do better. They believed that the "productivization" of Jews – a Zionist objective as well – would promote the integration of Jews into the emerging socialist economy and weaken grassroots anti-Semitism. This was in line with Moscow's policy of normalizing the status of non-territorial minorities by creating official enclaves for them.

To Soviet ideologues, the settlement of Jews in Birobidzhan – an area approximately the size of Belgium which Russia had annexed in 1858 – would transform shtetl Jews from petit-bourgeois shopkeepers and unskilled laborers into productive citizens contributing to the building of Communism.

The government had another good reason for luring Jews to Birobidzhan, which was populated by indigenous Siberian peoples and by Russians, Koreans and Ukrainians who had settled the region in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. It possessed untapped natural resources, lay in the path of the Trans-Siberian Railway and was strategically important due to Soviet fears of possible Chinese and Japanese expansionism.

During the mid-1920s, Moscow formed two organizations to publicize Birobidzhan. The first settlers arrived in 1928, attracted by incentives ranging from discounted travel and food subsidies to credit and tax exemptions.

Strangely enough, the authorities did little to prepare the newcomers, who had little or no agricultural experience, for the hardships of a forbidding landscape.

Nor, as Weinberg points out, did they provide the settlers with decent housing, potable water, barns, livestock, tools and equipment. Further, primitive medical facilities were frequently located far from the new settlements.

Many settlers, therefore, dropped out. Those who persevered usually gravitated toward Birobidzhan, the capital city of the Jewish Autonomous Region. There, ironically, they found jobs in the retail and service sectors and in government offices.

Life in the Jewish Autonomous Region gradually improved, although insufficient housing and food and inadequate medical and sanitary facilities continued to plague both rural and urban residents. A 1937 report stated that Birobidzhan, the city, still lacked a sewage system and public lighting.

Despite these shortcomings, the Jewish Autonomous Region became a centre for the production of cement, tin, bricks, paper products and clothing. Birobidzhan itself grew into a town of 30,000 by 1939.

Weinberg estimates that over 1,000 foreign Jews, mainly from Europe and North America, settled in Birobidzhan from the late 1920s to the mid-1930s. Awareness of the region in the Diaspora was promoted by the Association for Jewish Colonization in the Soviet Union (ICOR), which had over 10,000 dues-paying members in the 1930s.

ICOR raised funds for the purchase of tools and equipment for the fledgling collective farms and factories in the Jewish Autonomous Region, and even published a Yiddish newspaper, Nailebn.

Of course, Zionists actively disparaged Stalin's paradise, claiming that it could not satisfy the cultural and national aspirations of Soviet Jewry.

In accordance with its policy of elevating Yiddish as the bedrock of secular, proletarian Soviet Jewish culture, Moscow decreed that all government documents, posters and advertisements should appear in Yiddish. In addition, a Jewish theatre was opened, and Yiddish-language schools were built.

The purges unleashed by Stalin in 1936 had a devastating effect on Birobidzhan. Prominent Jewish officials were arrested after being charged with counter-revolutionary activities. In the surreal atmosphere of the times, one functionary was accused of trying to establish the Jewish Autonomous Region as a centre of Jewish culture in the Soviet Union!

Matters went from bad to worse. Stalin's emphasis on Great Russian patriotism resulted in the closing of Yiddish schools and synagogues, in Birobidzhan and elsewhere. Assimilation, once again, became the overriding goal of the Communist party.

For propaganda purposes, Stalin did not destroy the institutional and legal foundations of the Jewish Autonomous Region. But he ended the concerted effort to stimulate Jewish migration.

Weinberg does not entirely blame the government for the failure of Birobidzhan. By the mid-1930s, opportunities for upward mobility abounded in the Soviet Union, and hundreds of thousands of Jews from shtetls migrated to cities in the Russian heartland.

For a brief period after World War II, there was a resurgence of government interest in Birobidzhan. But the revival, such as it was, came to an abrupt halt in 1948 against the backdrop of the infamous Doctors' Plot.

In the dying days of the Soviet Union in the early 1990s, there was yet another revival of modest proportions. But in Weinberg's view, Birobidzhan's future is bleak.

So much for the Jewish Autonomous Region.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

The beast of modernity

Since the Enlightenment, all traditional religions have had to undergo a complex series of negotiations with what can be loosely termed "secular modernity." What do you do with the increasingly powerful effects of pluralism, perceived by some as progress and by others as corrosive? That is the central question that faces Jewish education today, and as I have suggested previously, has not been addressed in anything close to a satisfactory manner.

Various strategies of encounter have been attempted with the beast of modernity. There is at one end of the spectrum a kind of resigned surrender, where the message of God-given commandments and the obligation to follow an ancient moral code has been trashed in the name of cultural accommodation. This is another way of saying that secularism has stormed the gates, the battle is more or less lost, and we must now sue for the best terms possible (reduced anti-Semitism, maybe marry Jewish).

At the other end lies the ever defiant resisters of the Zeitgeist, for whom the problem lies in simply thickening the walls of the fortress in order to keep out the invader at all costs, and repel the effects of pluralist contamination.

The middle ground exemplifies what the sociologist Peter Berger calls the process of "cognitive bargaining," in which certain purist notions of faith are relinquished but other ideas are desperately maintained. Here the believer's internal compass would perhaps balk at the thought that the Bible is unerringly true and the miracles in it are literal, but it would stubbornly cling to the theory that the Torah reflects some kind of divine input, and that the Talmud is authoritative, but still a product of its own time in certain respects. Such an allowance of uncertainty, while intellectually honest, is of course fraught with peril, as people who hold this view will readily admit. In Berger's words: "One needs a very long spoon to dine with the devil of doubt; without it, one is liable to end up as dessert."

Ironically, all of these positions are linked by their reactionary nature. From the chassidic enclave to the proudly intermarried, the agenda is being set from the outside. It is the secular other who sucks dry our attention and energy, whether we are happy participators in its largely mindless carnival or bitter protesters of the proceedings.

This phenomenon was prescientily captured by Rabbi Abraham Heschel in 1958: "It is customary to blame secular science and anti-religious philosophy for the eclipse of religion in modern society. It would be more honest to blame religion for its own defeats. Religion declined not because it was refuted, but it became irrelevant, dull, oppressive, insipid." Here he identified Judaism's penchant for faulting the outside world instead of shouldering the blame for its own substitution of stifling habit in place of spiritual quest.

Rabbi Heschel was not alone in his analysis. Recently, Rabbi Moshe Eisemann, of the Ner Israel Yeshivah in Baltimore, similarly cast doubt on modernity as the villain: "We will miss the mark if we look outside ourselves for the sickness and therefore for the cure."

If Judaism is, as many of us believe, a religion filled with meaning and morality, wisdom and warmth, caring and courage, then we must display the security that such rhetoric entails.

Instead of focusing on the "evil empire" of Hollywood and McDonald's, it is time to patiently and painstakingly demonstrate to our children, in deed more than word, the beauty of our faith, and to bring out in full measure the meaning of Wordsworth's wonderful phrase: "What we love, others will love and we will show them how."

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Anne Frank and mass media

One of the most important documents about the Holocaust appeared in 1947 with the publishing of Anne Frank: The Diary of a Young Girl. Since then, the classic has appeared in dozens of languages, thousands of classrooms and on stages and movie screens around the world.

After the war, Otto Frank, the only survivor of the eight inhabitants, found his daughter's diary and published it in Dutch as Het Achterhuis (The Annex) [http://www.gale.com/gale/cwh/franka.html]. After its translation into English, this is the version that became familiar to millions of readers. When Otto Frank died in 1980, the diary was re-examined to prove its authenticity. Following that, new and controversial versions of the diaries were published with material never seen before by the public [http://www.annefrankonbroadway.com/anne-cgi/af?play/diary.html+HI].

The Critical Edition (1989) and The Definitive Edition (1995) restore diary entries which Otto Frank thought unsuitable to print 50 years earlier. It included passages on Anne's relationship with her mother and her thoughts on the role of women [http://remember.org/educate/afrank.html].

One new excerpt: "I look upon our life in hiding as an interesting adventure, full of danger and romance, and every privation as an amusing addition to my diary. I've made up my mind to lead a different life from other girls, and not to become an ordinary housewife later on." Rita Goldberg takes a personal and scholarly look at the changes and concludes that "Anne Frank lives on, through a diary made richer because her father is no longer around to protect her [http://www.bookwire.com/BBR/Life-&-Letters/read.Review$915]."

Of course, the diary has had an incredible impact in other media. In 1955, the diary came to the stage, and was given the Pulitzer Prize and virtually every other theatre award. Forty years later, the play was remounted on Broadway with Natalie Portman as the lead [http://www.csmonitor.com/durable/1997/11/18/feat/arts.1.html]. This version of the play also included new material that Otto Frank edited out. The show's producers have created an excellent Web site that includes a history of the book and the play [http://www.annefrankonbroadway.com/].

Shortly after its first stage success, the story moved to the screen as the memorable The Diary of Anne Frank (1959) with Millie Perkins, Joseph Schildkraut and Shelley Winters [http://us.imdb.com/Title?0052738]. For the many other film and television mini-series, go to the Internet Movie Database [http://us.imdb.com/] and search for "Anne Frank".

More recently, Anne Frank Remembered won the Academy Award for Best Feature Documentary [http://us.imdb.com/Title?0112373]. Using previously unreleased archival material in addition to contemporary interviews, the story of the Frank family is presented along with a fully rounded portrait of Anne. Time magazine called it a"harrowing, inspiring film. It alerts us that "villainy is the rank soil in which heroism can flower" [http://us.imdb.com/TUrls?COM+0112373].

Whether in book, play, movie or even musical form [http://www.annefrank.com/events/concert.html], the central message of Anne Frank continues to move and inspire new generations.

"It's a wonder I haven't abandoned all my ideals, they seem so absurd and impractical. Yet I cling to them because I still believe, in spite of everything, that people are truly good at heart."

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI MORDECHAI BULUA

'Chinam' explained

This week's Torah reading relates the incident of the 12 spies. Moshe sent 12 men, heads of their respective tribes, to spy out the land which God promised they would capture for their own. Unfortunately, 10 of the 12 brought back such a dismaying report that the Jews lost heart and broke down weeping.

To this, God, according to the Talmud (Ta'anis 29a) responded, "You cry tonight for no reason; on this very night in the future I will give you cause to cry for good reason." That night was Tisha b'Av. On that night, both the first and second Temples were destroyed.

What caused the spies to act as they did? The Zohar explains that the spies realized that once they lived in Israel under a central government, they would lose their power and position.

The Mishnah in Pirkei Avot (4:28) says: "Envy, inordinate desire and the search for glory remove a man from this world." Indeed, the desire to retain honor and glory brought a premature end to the spies who died a terrible death.

How then should a person achieve honor? Pirkei Avot gives the answer. (4:1) Ben Zoma says: "Who is honorable? He who honors his fellow men." The Talmud (Eruvin 13b) says: Honor flees from him who runs after honor. Honor pursues him who flees from honor.

A man once came to his spiritual leader and said: "Rabbi, they say that if you flee from honor, honor will pursue you. How is it that I keep running away from it, and yet it has never caught up with me?"

With a twinkle the rabbi replied, "the trouble is that you are always looking back over your shoulder to see if honor is running after you. That is why it will not follow you."

The words the Talmud (Ta'anis 29a) uses to describe the sin of the Jews in the incident of the spies is "bechiah shel chinam," that they cried for no reason. Amazingly, the same Hebrew word chinam, is used as the reason for the destruction of the second Temple. The Talmud explains (Yoma 9a) that the second Temple was destroyed because of sinat chinam, because of hatred of one's fellow Jew for no reason.

I believe the usage of the word chinam, to describe both the sin of the Jews in the incident of the spies and their sin during the second Temple period, is not "without reason."

Judaism teaches us that there is a reason for everything in life. Every emotion has its time and place, as it says in Kohelet, Ecclesiastes: "there is a time to cry and a time to laugh; a time to love and a time to hate." We are allowed to cry, but only at certain times, such as at the death of a loved one, God forbid, or on Tisha b'Av. We are allowed to hate, but only truly evil people, such as Amalek and the Nazis. Our feelings and actions must always be based on sound reason.

According to Rabbi Yechezkel of Kozmir and Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, first chief rabbi of Israel, there is one exception to this rule. The second Temple, which was destroyed because of sinat chinam, hatred without reason, they say, will only be rebuilt when there is ahavat chinam, love without reason; when Jews show their concern for others, even when they differ from them in their values, ideas, and levels of observance, simply because they are fellow Jews.

A cautionary parable

The Conversion*, by Aharon Appelfeld (Random House, $31).

Books
Bernard Baskin

After Amos Oz and A.B. Yehoshua, Aharon Appelfeld is probably Israel's third best known novelist. Born in Czernowitz, now part of Ukraine, he was imprisoned at the age of nine in a Nazi concentration camp. He escaped and hid in forests until he was discovered by Russian troops, who trained him as a kitchen boy.

Appelfeld immigrated to Palestine in 1946. His books, written in Hebrew, have been translated into many languages and include the internationally acclaimed Badenheim 1939 and such provocative novels as Unto the Soul, The Retreat, and most recently The Iron Tracks.

His novels are comparatively brief. Many of them deal with Jews just prior to the Holocaust, who delude themselves into thinking that they will be safe and that the Nazi madness will inevitably disappear.

The Conversion, the author's 12th novel to reach English translation, is set in Neufeld, a small Austrian town. Over the years, most young Jews there have converted to Christianity, which is the only way they can find advancement in their work and receive a measure of respect and friendship from their neighbors.

A local priest, Father Mercer, takes pride in the many Jews he has brought to the Christian altar, as church bells ring out in triumph.

Karl Hubner, with his mother's approval, converted in order to facilitate his advancement as a municipal official. But he is troubled with nagging feelings of guilt and with memories of half-forgotten Jewish traditions and rituals.

Regarded with suspicion by the town's Christians and aware of the insecurity and self-imposed isolation of many of his fellow converts, he is left with an awkward sense of alienation.

Appelfeld writes, "At first the other converts were pleased that Karl had converted. But over the years he observed that they seldom showed themselves in public, preferring to lead their lives in seclusion. They were never eager to meet with childhood friends."

When his aunt Frenzi, a former cabaret singer and actress, suddenly dies, Karl attends her funeral in a small provincial town. Despite the scandal attached to her name because of her numerous affairs, she had remained loyal to Judaism and despised apostates.

There, in the village of his untroubled childhood, Karl is welcomed by Gloria, the non-Jewish housemaid who had devotedly nursed his parents when they were dying. His reunion with her leads to mutual affection and provides a pathway to increased pride in his Jewish origin.

"Later, sitting in his room, Karl realized that Gloria was adhering scrupulously to every act of religious observance that his mother had been accustomed to doing, not omitting a thing.

The thought frightened him, and for a moment he wanted to go to her and say, 'You aren't obliged to observe all the commandments and customs. The dead are separate from us. You mustn't assume their fate.' But those words slipped from his mind, and to his surprise he saw again the long corridor of the synagogue, in whose darkness they used to light memorial candles."

When the municipal government in a redevelopment project decides to abolish the Jewish market area, Karl vehemently defends the Jewish shopkeepers. In the face of the anti-Semitic storm that results he resigns from his coveted position.

Karl and Gloria, now lovers, leave Neufeld en route to the larger and more liberal city of Krakow, Poland. They get off the train, however, at the Austrian village where Karl's mother was born. There they try to live peacefully with their neighbors. But they come to a violent and tragic end in a tide of anti-Semitic fury.

In this cautionary parable conversion and assimilation mean a loss of self esteem, and are a fruitless attempt to win acceptance in the eyes of the majority. The book is also a powerful indictment of Austrian anti-Semitism prior to the Holocaust.

Above all, the reader is left with the portrait of a sensitive and frustrated protagonist in search of meaning and identity, but unable to find inner meaning or peace.

Canada's UN role an area for concern: CIC

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada's position on Israel at the United Nations could have serious consequences for the Jewish state, according to Brian Morris, executive director of the Canada-Israel Committee.

Morris was speaking at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation at a program sponsored by the synagogue's brotherhood and by the Entertainment and Cultural Connection.

Until recently, Morris said, Canada has voted in favor of Israel, or at least abstained. That policy has changed, however.

"It is no secret," Morris said, "that [Foreign Minister] Lloyd Axworthy wants the Nobel Peace Prize. He tried with the anti-mining campaign; he tried to play broker during the war with Serbia. Now he thinks that the Middle East is the best bet."

This is reflected in the change in Canada's stance at the UN, he said.

It is important to realize that the UN "is a club with its own rules. The resolutions don't have to be fair – they just have to get majority support," he said.

The situation is a concern, Morris said, because the Arabs are trying several new tactics in their diplomatic war with Israel.

Morris said he is appalled at the decision to convene a meeting in July to discuss the possibility that Israel's leaders can be considered war criminals.

He was referring to a resolution passed by the UN in February and supported by Canada calling for a conference in July to discuss whether the fourth Geneva Convention, which prohibits any country that has waged a war of aggression from forcibly occupying territory, applies to the territories occupied by Israel after the Six Day War.

"The Arabs have never been able to take Israel to the International Court at The Hague, because those accusations don't hold up. The Arabs or Jordan started the wars, and the disputed areas have always been mainly Jewish. Only Jordan expelled populations; Israel never did."

The February emergency session of the UN was convened at the request of the Arab League, "something that wasn't done for Yugoslavia or Africa," Morris pointed out.

Those at the session resurrected Resolution 181, the original UN resolution of 1947, which partitioned Israel into two states, a resolution that the Arabs never accepted.

"Canada is being hypocritical," said Morris. "If you support a bilateral approach to the peace process, as Canada says it does, you can't allow the negotiations to be sideswiped by the Arabs going to the UN anytime they are not pleased."

Both the Oslo and the Wye agreements have dispute resolution mechanisms built in. The Arabs have never invoked them, Morris said.

The inherent danger of all this, he said, is that if a Palestinian state has already been created (through Resolution 181), then Israel is an occupying power, and the Arabs can take Israel to The Hague, and can pressure the UN to declare Israeli leaders to be war criminals.

"The harm to Israel and the Jews would be irreparable," Morris said. "The United States is vehemently opposed to it. We can't forgive Canada if it votes for that meeting."

In the question period, former Ontario cabinet minister David Rotenberg noted that the Palestinian Covenant itself says that Resolution 181 is null and void.

What must be remembered, Morris said, is that world sympathy is with the Palestinians. "The only thing that helps is taking politicians to Israel. They come back totally changed."

The United States, Morris added, still supports Israel. "For the first time, the American ambassador to Israel took a suite in Jerusalem, and is meeting Jewish groups there."

Jewish future in Vilna said to be in doubt

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The future of the Jewish community in Vilna, once known as the Jerusalem of Lithuania, is in doubt, said Vivian Felsen, an artist who attended a Yiddish course there last year.

At a Pioneer Women's meeting in the Borochov Centre, she showed color slides she took of the city, which was the centre of eastern European Jewish culture in the 19th century and the early decades of the 20th century.

Felsen said the 3,500 Jews in Vilna are mostly elderly and many are poverty stricken, existing on pensions of $30 to $50 a month.

She said they also face anti-Semitism: in Lithuania some deputies in parliament are openly anti-Semitic.

Felsen, a member of the Friends of Yiddish, said she was one of four Torontonians in the summer course, which was designed to revive Yiddish in Vilna, one of the city's main spoken languages before the Holocaust.

One-third of the students in last year's Yiddish course were not Jewish. The course is being given again this summer.

Felsen said she was anxious to visit the birthplace of her maternal grandparents. Ninety-four percent of the Jews were killed in Lithuania during the Holocaust, the highest rate in any country, she said.

Heaping praise on the faculty of the course, she said one staffer took pains to point out to the young non-Jewish Lithuanian students what their grandparents had done to the Jews.

Felsen said she saw many monuments to commemorate Jews, which had been erected by the Lithuanian government.

There is a daily minyan at a Vilna synagogue attended by 50 Jews, because a London Jewish businessman pays $500 a month to keep it going, she noted.

Kiever shul marks 85th year

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Kiever Synagogue, located in the Kensington Market area, recently celebrated its 85th anniversary at a Sabbath service.

The real name for the beautifully preserved synagogue, which in 1981 became the first Jewish facility in Ontario designated as a historical heritage site, is the First Russian Congregation Rodfei Sholem Anshei Kiev.

To commemorate the 85th anniversary, new mantles were commissioned to cover the nine sefrei Torah, as well as a parochet (covering for the Aron Kodesh), two shulchan covers, a lectern cover, and other religious objects.

These will complement the shul's original Zodiac paintings, religious objects, stained glass windows, early-century architecture and photographs, which present a visual look at the past.

On view at the shul are the ceremonial key used when the synagogue was dedicated, the antique corner sink used for washing hands, and the cornerstone from the original house. A large marble wall marker contains the names of the original founders, and there are eight panels of marble yahrzeit dates and names dating back to the 1920s.

At the turn of the century, small shuls, called shtieblach, were sprinkled in and around Centre Avenue, in the area called the Ward. These shtieblach were formed by males who came from the same eastern European areas.

Founded by immigrants from the Kiev region of Russia, the Kiever shul's families were first associated with congregation Shaarei Zedeck. A dispute over burial rights led to the resignation of several members, who then formed Chevra Rodfei Sholem. The congregation held prayers and meetings in the homes of members.

David Pinkus, son of Isadore Pinkus, one of the synagogue's founders, said the synagogue was granted letters to patent it as a religious congregation in 1914, which permitted the members to purchase land. In 1917, Louis Bossin bought a house at the corner of Dennison Square and Bellevue Avenue. In 1921, a second house was acquired by the congregation.

Architect Benjamin Swartz designed a synagogue to be built on the site of these houses. The structure was completed in 1927, and the building has remained largely unchanged. The mortgage on the synagogue was $16,000.

The synagogue has separate seating for men and women. It has a membership of some 150, and 450 to 500 people attend the High Holy Days services.

Services are held on Shabbat, Jewish holidays, and for special occasions. Pinchas Gutter serves as the honorary chazzan.

Members of the executive include Sol Feingold, vice-president; Myer Orzech, second vice-president; and Max Pinkus, treasurer.

As part of a celebration of Kensington's history, Heritage Toronto will unveil a plaque in the park in Bellevue Square opposite the shul, on June 21 at 3 p.m. The plaque will have the history of the Kensington market area and a copy of a photograph called Buying Poultry on Kensington Avenue – 1922, which hangs in the synagogue's social hall.

CHAT breaks ground for major expansion

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — To whoops of joy from current students, the odd tear from former students and enthusiastic applause, philanthropist Anne Tanenbaum ceremonially broke ground for a massive renovation and extension of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

The 45,000-square-foot expansion, which will double the size of the current school, will include 21 new classrooms, a library, a computer centre, an athletic wing, a central atrium cafeteria, and a total renovation of the current building.

The facility will be called the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Education Centre.

It will serve a student body which has grown from 200 to an expected enrolment of 1,100 in the 1999-2000 school year.

School president Baila Lubek called the groundbreaking "both a culmination and a beginning."

She noted that 40 years ago, a group of people "worked to establish a community Hebrew high school, which would offer an education which would encompass Jewish traditions and teachings together with a general studies curriculum."

It was to be, and is now, Lubeck said, a place where a student "can explore Judaism in an open atmosphere."

CHAT reflects the successful partnership between the Toronto District School Board (and its local predecessor the North York School Board) and UJA Federation, with its "financial, experiences and human resources," she said.

Stephen Freedhoff, who was praised earlier as a tireless and dedicated worker for CHAT, noted that Anne Tanenbaum, who will celebrate her 90th birthday later this year, had attended that morning the brit milah for her 19th great grandchild.

Anne Tanenbaum, assisted by her son Larry, prepares to break ground for the renovated and expanded CHAT campus. [Stephen Epstein photo]

Students cheer

"Thank you for making our dreams come true," he told her.

To cheers from the students, Freedhoff said that the renovation would "eliminate the portables, eating in the corridors, and sweltering from too much heat or no air conditioning."

Marty Rochwerg, a parent and also an active worker for the school, praised CHAT for being "open to all who want an excellent Jewish education, where we expect acceptance and respect for classmates, whatever their level of observance."

This tolerance, he said, is "fundamental for the unity of the Jewish people."

Headmaster Paul Shaviv spoke about CHAT's "vision, which is almost limitless." He called CHAT graduates "the educated backbone of the Jewish community.

"We don't educate the Orthodox, the Conservative, the Reform or the Reconstructionist – we educate Jews."

CHAT, he said, is a leader in North American Jewish education.

In its widest perspective, he went on, "every Jewish school is part of the post Holocaust rebuilding and healing of the Jewish people. Every student of every Jewish school is a precious part of Jewish history."

Norman Grill, a past president of CHAT, acknowledged the help and hard work of Mel Finklestein, Bernie Ghert, and Marty Goldberg.

Greetings on behalf of the State of Israel were brought by Jehudi Kinar, outgoing Israeli consul general to Toronto and greetings from UJA Federation were expressed by Alan Sandler.

BJE says goodbye to executive director

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – At a somewhat bittersweet reception at the Lipa Green building last week, UJA Federation, the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) and the Toronto Jewish education world said farewell to Rabbi Jeremiah Unterman, for the past two years executive director of the BJE.

Rabbi Unterman, in an interview before the reception, told The CJN that while the Toronto Jewish community is "wonderful, [and] I have made many good friends here," he felt that the position didn't afford him the satisfaction of hands-on teaching.

He has accepted a senior educator's fellowship at Bar-Ilan University, where he will "take courses to retool as a day school principal."

The opportunity to spend a year in Israel was "too good to pass up," he said.

Rabbi Unterman said that during his tenure there were considerable strides in such areas as family and supplementary education, and special education. Staff has been added, and a comprehensive study of special needs children is underway.

Discussion has begun about a community supplementary high school, which he feels is essential, "especially since 75 percent of high school teens receive no Jewish education whatsoever."

The BJE has begun to pay more attention to providing increased funding to She'arim and Zareinu, and "is looking at expansion of both, and we are thrilled about the ongoing success of CHAT."

Finally, next year a pilot project will start in several of the day schools, called reflective practice.

He explained that "it seeks to train educational staff to address the non-academic needs of the children, to care for the students at a level akin to being a parent, with love and guidance."

Rabbi Unterman is concerned that "not enough leaders from the different spectrum are communicating with each other.

"We need to look for ways to pull together."

Some day, he said with a grin, people will recognize that "God is not over my right shoulder, and the devil isn't over my left one."

At the reception, attended by representatives of UJA Federation, BJE staff, educators, and friends, Rabbi Unterman was praised for his ability to work with those from all segments of the community, whether he agreed with them religiously or not.

Past BJE chair Sandy Brown, current president Shirley Worth, and BJE staffer Yael Seliger commented on his commitment and passion for Jewish education, and his "pluralistic vision," as Seliger described it.

He was presented with a book by UJA Federation, and by 18 trees planted in Israel by Jewish National Fund, which were announced by Ben Prossin, executive director of JNF, and Col. Yaen Vered, shaliach to JNF. Vered said that Rabbi Unterman's Judaism was "a Judaism without adjectives."

Rabbi Unterman said that he was grateful for the "friendships, wisdom, and kindness he experienced with colleagues and friends.

He said that the story of Miriam and Aaron slandering Moses, in the weekly Torah portion, showed that a true leader must act with humility, and respect for others, without compromising their own principles.

"They must treat their staff with respect and consideration, and then the success of the community will be assured.

"Thank you for the way you treated me this evening," he concluded emotionally.

Associated Hebrew Schools launches new campus

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Parents, students, faculty, board and administration members, alumni and the community, came together recently to formally celebrate the opening of the Neptune Campus of Associated Hebrew Schools.

The 35,000-square-foot building has 12 classrooms, four pre-school rooms, a library, a multi-purpose room, offices and seminar rooms.

The school, which can serve 400 children from pre-school to Grade 6, is near capacity.

Even the students helped prepare for the event by creating special art projects which were displayed on the walls and on tables outside the auditorium.

Aurelia Ostro, president of the parent-teacher council, told the nearly 250 people attending, that all of the current students will get a special T-shirt, saying, I Got Here First.

Associated, she said, is proud that "its graduates are in all fields, and on all boards in the community."

Program chair Robin Gofine, said the Associated staff and its parent and student body is "like an extended family that grows from generation to generation," adding that many families had attended the school for several generations.

Representatives of the Posluns, Singer and Zagdanski families, who not only gave generous gifts, but worked hard to raise more funds, were presented with mezuzot, specially fashioned by Brenda Gasner Lass.

Keynote speaker Rabbi Haskel Lookstein, spiritual leader of Congregation Kehilath Jeshurun in New York, and principal of the Ramaz School, said it was "awe inspiring" to be present at the official opening, as he was three years ago at the beginning of the fund-raising effort for the construction of the new building.

Rabbi Lookstein said that the significance of what Associated has accomplished for its students is exemplified in the Book of Ruth, which is read in the synagogue during Shavuot. Those lessons, chesed and philanthropy, "are taught by example. The lessons of ethics and morality are caught, not taught."

Knowing the proper thing to do is important, Rabbi Lookstein said, but going the extra effort is what counts.

Both Orpah and Ruth were good and kind people who didn't want to abandon Naomi after the death of her husband and sons. At Naomi's urging, Orpah returned to her family. Ruth, however, stayed.

"The first reaction of both of them was to stay. They both had good intentions – but Ruth stuck to it," he said.

It is that effort that makes the whole difference in history, the rabbi said. Because of it, "Ruth's descendent David, was the ancestor of the Messiah.

"Abraham, who ran to greet and offer hospitality to strangers, even though he was ill, was told by God that his seed would be like the stars in heaven, and Rebecca was chosen as a wife for Isaac because she exerted herself to feed the camels as well as the travellers.

"Day school too takes extra effort – two curriculums, two faculties, a second language, longer hours, more expense," the rabbi said.

So too does ahavat Yisroel take extra effort. "It is no trick to love those who agree with you. It is much harder to love all those Jews with whom you don't agree with."

Referring to the Israeli election, which had just taken place, he said that "Shas has to love Meretz. Meretz has to love Mafdal. Labor has to love Benny Begin."

Without internal ahavat Yisroel, he warned, "Israel is in big trouble. It won't matter what happens with the Arabs."

Congratulating those who had donated large amounts to the new school, Rabbi Lookstein noted that "after a building is built, it takes lots of extra effort to keep it running."

Reform conference adopts new statement of principles

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As a result of a new statement of principles adopted at a recent conference in Pittsburgh, Reform Judaism will emphasize traditions such as kashrut and Sabbath observance.

This is the gist of the reaction of most of the 12 Canadians who attended the four-day conference of the Central Conference of American Rabbis. The principles, subject to a lot of debate to clarify language, were approved by a vote of 324-68 on the final day.

The emphasis on tradition will not mean any immediate change in Reform congregations across Canada, but in the long run may mean more acceptance of kashrut and Sabbath observance, said Rabbi Paul Golomb, executive director, Canadian Council of Reform Judaism.

The only Canadian on the task force which drew up the principles, Rabbi Michael Stroh of Temple Har Zion, said the statement avoids specifics.

"I don't think Reform Jews will stop driving their cars on Shabbat, or avoid putting on their lights," said Rabbi Stroh.

The final vote, which approved the principles on a four-to-one basis, was an accurate indication of the way the Canadian rabbis voted, said Rabbi Golomb.

"The new principles are much bigger news in parts of the United States than in Canada, where the Reform movement has been more attached to tradition," said Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

The new statement reflects fairly what Canadians of Reform persuasion are already doing, she said.

The laity in Canada will react rather quickly to the direction to be more observant, particularly in view of the massive publicity for the principles in the United States, she said.

Though he does not favor general statements, Rabbi Dow Marmur of Holy Blossom Temple, said he approves the emphasis on tradition, observance and inclusiveness, outlined in the principles.

"We will not turn any Jew away," he said.

At one point, a draft of the statement had approved kashrut and the wearing of kipot and tfillin during services but this was dropped in the final version.

The task force worked on the statement for two years and along the way it underwent six drafts and garnered more than 30 amendments.

It is a great change from the 1885 statement of principles, also adopted in Pittsburgh, which said kashrut and dietary rules no longer applied.

Among other things, the document affirms the importance of studying Hebrew, promotes lifelong Jewish learning, calls for observance of mitzvot, urges observance in some form of Shabbat and holidays, and encourages tikkun olam (social action) and tzedakah.

"The principles will liberate Reform Jews to say there is nothing in the Torah which is barred to me," said Rabbi Richard Levy, outgoing CCAR president.

Transport survivors to meet

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —As children, they escaped the Holocaust on the kinder transport, and now, 61 years later, they are returning to Vienna for a week-long stay as guests of the Austrian government.

The group of 11, including some wives, leave for Vienna on June 19, although some will attend a reunion of kinder transport escapees in London, England, before going on to the Austrian capital.

In Vienna, they will meet the mayor, be dined and be taken on a tour of the city, as part of a program that includes a visit to the cemetery where some of their parents are buried. Meetings with high school students, and services at a local synagogue are also included.

The Canadian group is quite a diverse one, including Martin Maxwell, 75, who later joined the British army and took part as a glider pilot in the raid on Arnhem.

Maxwell, the president of National Home Products Ltd., which imports razor blades from Israel and earned a certificate from the Canadian-Israeli Chamber of Commerce, got to England as a boy of 14.

Another member of the group, Lisa Collier, was on a kinder transport which left for England on August 8, 1939. She is the only one of four surviving members of her family who came to Canada. The others live in the United States, Australia and Israel.

Brothers Arthur and Walter Steuerman were separated when they reached England. Walter was sent off with younger children. Their wives are joining them on the trip to Vienna.

Arthur Steuerman, who lost his parents at Auschwitz, was interned as a friendly alien when he arrived in Canada 59 years ago.

Paul Heiman, a kinder transport escapee, and his wife, Trudy, who escaped on foot in Czechoslovakia are both going to Vienna. They met 42 years ago in Toronto, by chance, when Paul offered Trudy a ride home since there was an hour-long wait for a bus in those days on Wilson Avenue.

They discovered they had lived parallel lives in their escape from the Nazis.

A keyboard player, Heiman entertained the troops with his own band following a bout of war work. The Heimans attended the first reunion of kinder transport people in England 10 years ago.

Max Kingston, 70, hopes to find out if the home where he was born in Lakenbach, Austria, and the synagogue he attended with his family, are still standing.

On an earlier trip to Vienna, 35 years ago, he learned that his mother died in Theresienstadt and his father in Auschwitz

Kingston and his older brother Egon who is deceased, lived with a family in Edinburgh, Scotland, for five years, before Kingston joined Egon in London as a cabinet maker.

Now semi-retired, Kingston came to Canada 31 years ago where he managed a lumber mill.

YOU ARE MARRIED AND YOU FEEL ALONE

More than likely this emotional distancing reflects a destructive conflict management style, as well as an absence of friendship enhancing behaviours. A successful marriage requires attention not only to the subjective worlds of both spouses, but also the marriage (i.e. relationship) itself requires intimacy enhancing relatedness to avoid growing stale.

The Starrs', who have been working successfully with couples for close to 20 years, teach them how their current relationship style has produced the emotional rut they are in, and how they can enhance their connectedness without giving up their deepest longings.

בנאום שנשא ברק בכיכר רבין אחרי זכייתו בבחירות הוא התייחס לשיר המרגש "הילדים של חורף 73." לאלה מיכם שאינם מכירים את השיר, אביא חלק קטן ממנו ואחר כך אתייחס אליו ואל מה שאמר אהוד ברק:

"אנחנו הילדים של
חורף, שנת שבעים ושלוש,
חלמתם אותנו לראשונה עם שחר בתום הקרבות,
הייתם גברים עייפים שהחזו למזלם הטוב,
הייתם נשים צעירות מודאגות ורציתן כל כך לאהוב...
...הבטחתם יונה, עלה של זית,
הבטחתם שלום בבית,
הבטחתם אביב ופריחות
הבטחתם לקיים הבטחות"

ידידי מרדכי בן דת, עורך CJN, תיאר כך את התוצאות:

"There has been a thunderclap of change in Israel."

Hadassah-WIZO honors Barbara Amiel Black

By SHEILA DROPKIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Barbara Amiel Black recently expressed her opinions about current Israeli issues at Toronto Hadassah-WIZO's annual Youth Aliyah luncheon.

In referring to the Israeli elections, Amiel said she was disappointed at former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, whom she accused of being intransigent over petty matters and unnecessarily provocative.

"His drive to retain power at any cost," she said, "distorted his judgment. He tried to please everyone and betrayed all."

Barbara Amiel Black

Wishing Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak well, she said that in the long run it wouldn't really matter who won. "Ultimately all Israeli governments will have the same hurdle to jump – mainly the refusal by the Arab nations to accept Israel as a fact.

"The best we can hope for in our lifetime is a series of armistices," she said, adding that she believes it will take many generations before there is true peace between Israel and her neighbors.

Israel's ultimate "war aim" is peace, she said, but the goal for the Arabs, on the other hand, is to defeat Israel.

She then provided examples of what she described as the Arabs' continuous and open hatred of Israel, including the deliberate omission of Israel from maps, deceitful and inciteful remarks by leaders of the Palestinian Authority, hostility by so-called moderate Arabs, the labelling of the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial as a "centre of lies," and distortions in the history textbooks used by Arab children.

Looking at the situation in Kosovo, she said that to compare it with the Holcoaust is "muddled and flabby thinking.

"I am not indifferent to the suffering of the Kosovars, but to suggest in any way that they are equal to the Jews' suffering under the Third Reich is inconceiveable. The Jews didn't have the luxury of deportation [to a safe haven]; they were deported to concentration camps."

She cautioned that everyone "must politely listen to Israel's critics and refute them with knowledge."

She concluded by saying that she carries her own shame for not standing up strongly enough for Israel, both inside and outside the Jewish community. "Today is a good time to begin."

Proceeds of the luncheon will help fund the Netanya Technological High School, the Ben Yakir Youth Village for troubled teenage boys, and the Hadassah-WIZO Canada Research and Residential Institute in Jerusalem for developmentally disabled children.

Other speakers included Canadian Hadassah-WIZO national president Patricia Albert, Toronto president Sharon Kroft and Toronto Youth Aliyah campaign chair Ros Lewis. In addition, Ruti Kinar brought greetings on behalf of her husband, Jehudi Kinar, Israel's consul general to Toronto.

Panelists at women's seminar preach financial awareness

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Knowledge is power, was the consensus among four panelists at a recent seminar on Financial Empowerment for Women.

The seminar, presented by Jewish Women's Federation and UJA Federation Women's Campaign at the Lipa Green Building, featured tax accountant Charlotte Haber, succession and tax planning expert Deborah Stern, family lawyer Anne Freed, and estate planning lawyer Tammy Anklewicz. Paula Stark, investment adviser at Nesbitt Burns, moderated the discussion.

"I'm sure you'd feel more comfortable talking about intimate issues like your sex lives or health matters, than you do talking about money," said Stark. "Tonight we're here to let you know that it's okay to ask, it's never too late to ask, and that no question is too unimportant."

Money will not take care of itself, she stressed.

Haber, who advises women in situations of divorce, widowhood and new business ventures, discussed the importance of knowing where family assets come from, how they grow, other sources of income, and the control one has over those issues.

A business, even an unincorporated one, may provide an opportunity to pay discretionary salaries to spouses and children, thus providing tax benefits, she noted.

The spouse who serves as employer (or whose family serves as employer) has greater power, she said. Divorcing women who no longer receive a salary from their husbands' business have little or no power, but their power is greater if they are shareholders and/or hold directorships, she said.

Haber advised women to, at minimum, understand the sources of their cash flow, and if possible to increase their involvement in the business.

She also advised the audience to become involved in investment decisions, read the business section in the newspaper and make sure RRSPs are built up in their own names.

Anklewicz, the estate planning lawyer, focused on the importance of planning ahead.

Marriage contracts don't have to take away the romance if they're approached properly, Anklewicz believes.

In a case study of a 26-year-old dentist, a marriage contract could "protect Zayde's gift" (inheritance money used to buy a home) and keep the couple's practices separate, at the same time specifying that "everything else we build together we will share."

If a couple moves to a different jurisdiction, Anklewicz noted later, their marriage contract should be reviewed by a local matrimonial lawyer.

The dentist might also want to update her will. Following marriage her entire estate goes to her husband unless she has indicated otherwise, explained Anklewicz.

Taking the case further, it would also be in order for the dentist's parents to examine their wills and powers of attorney, given the implications of the marriage – not to mention their son's upcoming move to the United States.

Having a Canadian resident as executor could avoid negative tax implications, Anklewicz noted.

For the next generation up in the family, illness is a concern. If the grandfather has to go into an institution, will there be enough money to maintain him and his wife in two separate places?

Also, the grandfather needs a power of attorney (and an alternate if his wife, his first choice, becomes incapacitated). Otherwise, she may not be able to sell their jointly owned home without an expensive and lengthy legal process, Anklewicz explained.

"If we don't take control when we're young and healthy...or older and not so healthy but when we still have our capacity," she said, "we can be in a situation where the government comes in and takes control over our financial affairs."

Women had better know who their lawyer, accountant and family investment adviser are, said Anklewicz. "Nothing's worse than a lack of knowledge and a fear to ask for help."

Stern, a partner in KPMG, discussed RRSPs, and reminded self-employed women that they should be paying themselves a salary, as long as it is reasonable and for services actually rendered.

The rule of thumb regarding borrowing to make an RRSP contribution, is to do so only if the loan can be repaid within a year, or if you are temporarily in a higher tax bracket.

Stern also noted that unused contributions may be carried forward and put in the RRSP any time before the contributor turns 69.

Freed, the family lawyer, believes financial knowledge can help a marriage stay intact. It is also very helpful in the event of marriage breakdown, she noted.

"Know what you're signing and why," Freed advised. "If you're remortgaging a house for your husband's business, understand all the ramifications, both good and bad. Ask all the questions you need to."

Freed also noted that it's not too late for married women to have a marriage contract drawn up. For engaged women, she recommended not leaving it till the last minute.

"If in doubt, simply make an appointment to see a lawyer for a consultation. Two hundred and fifty dollars may be well worth it."

HUMANE, HUMANITARIAN AND A HAVEN

The 3-month-old crisis in Kosovo has not only tested the resolve, emotions and morality of the west, it has tested the very values that western society purports to live by. Israel's response to the crisis has been humane and humanitarian. In the above photo we see a refugee from Kosovo clutching her recently born infant. Her Israeli obstetrician, part of a 70-member Israeli medical team, is standing beside her. The Israeli medical team set up a 100-bed field hospital in Macedonia for refugees from Kosovo. At right, is the first group of more than 100 Muslim Kosovar refugees arriving in Israel where they have found shelter and haven. It is fitting therefore, that we use these photos as the springboard for the ensuing 11 pages of A Tribute to Israel.

Israel braces itself for record number of visitors

By GAIL LICHTMAN
WZPS

The Wall is to be adapted to accommodate increased numbers of visitors while preserving its sanctity. [Joseph Serge photo]

The year 2000 is presenting the State of Israel with a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to be the spiritual, cultural and religious showplace of world tourism, with the anticipated four to six million visitors being touted as the answer to Israel's flagging tourism industry – the needed boost to put this sector back on track after three years of slumping numbers.

There is no doubt that with an estimated input of $3.4 billion into the Israeli economy and the creation of some 50,000 new jobs, the 2000 boom has all the makings of a tourism bonanza. But it also has the makings of a disaster. Will Israel be prepared to accommodate more than double the number of tourists it presently gets? No room at the inn could prove just as disastrous as not enough guests.

At the beginning of 1998, the Israeli government established the Israel 2000 Authority within the Ministry of Tourism, to coordinate, supervise and encourage the relevant government ministries and authorities to plan and prepare for the year 2000. In addition, a joint interministerial committee, including the ministries of Tourism, Foreign Affairs and Religious Affairs, was established to work in conjunction with various churches in coordinating millennial events and festivities.

In 1998-99, $92.5 million was allocated to tourism infrastructure development around the country. Of that amount, $62.5 million is being invested in projects directly connected with the year 2000.

A major focus of this development is Jerusalem, for as the spiritual centre of the three great monotheistic religions – Judaism, Christianity and Islam – that city is Israel's major tourist attraction. More than 80 percent of all tourists to the country– approximately 60 percent are Christians and 27 percent are Jews – visit Jerusalem for an average of four days.

In light of the great importance Christianity attaches to pilgrimages to the Holy Land in the year 2000, and as a result of the expected visit of Pope John Paul II, the Ministry of Tourism estimates that Christian tourism will make up approximately 65 percent of all tourism to Israel in the year 2000.

Working with the Jerusalem municipality, the Government Tourist Corporation and the Company of East Jerusalem, the Ministry of Tourism has established a steering committee to oversee tourism development in the Holy City. The committee will develop tourism infrastructure for hotels, new tourist sites and commercial attractions.

Some 20 percent of the ministry's overall tourism budget has been designated for Jerusalem, with additional sums being provided by the other partners, as well as the Jerusalem municipality.

The main projects (costs in U.S. dollars) are:

The King's Valley — At a cost of some $12.5 million, the Kidron Valley, which is bordered by the Mount of Olives, the Garden of Gethsemane, the Temple Mount and the Ben Hinnom Valley, is to be turned into the King's Valley open air museum by creating a geographical, chronological tourist route with walkways and roads linking the valley's various sites. These include the City of David, the Ophel Promenade, the Lion's Gate, Gethsemane and the Gihon Spring.

The City Centre — Jerusalem's downtown is set for a $5-million infrastructure facelift designed to create a variety of new attractions, places of entertainment and accommodations.

The Old City — Some $2.5

million is slated for improving existing tourist sites and preparing them to receive large numbers of visitors.

The Western Wall — The Wall will be adapted at a cost of $3.5 million to accommodate increased numbers of visitors while maintaining its sanctity.

Illumination of Sites — About $32.5 million is being invested in illuminating Jerusalem structures with distinctive architectural character in order to beautify the city. When completed, this project will illuminate some 100 unique structures all over town, including the walls of the Old City, Mishkenot Sha'ananim, the Nablus Gate, and the Mount of Olives. In addition, more tourist signposts will be going up, as well as a tourist information centre next to City Hall.

Hotel Promotion — There are about 8,000 hotel rooms in Jerusalem today. Another 2,000 rooms are currently under construction, with building permits issued for an additional 2,000. The Ministry of Tourism is promoting hotel building in different areas of the city, and hopes by the year 2006 to add up to 10,000 rooms.

In addition to infrastructure, the ministry is working on promoting Jerusalem as a tourist site to the world at large. A $26 million a year media campaign for 1999 and 2000 will include advertising, seminars for travel agents and the production of posters and brochures.

But the big question remains – will Israel be ready? And ready for what numbers?

At a meeting in Jerusalem in March 1999, Monsignor Librio Andriatta, director of the Vatican's official travel agency, told Israel's minister of tourism, Moshe Katsav, that he expects six million Christian pilgrims to come to Israel during the year 2000, an increase of more than 50 percent over the figures the ministry has been using as the basis for its planning.

Jerusalem hoteliers were delighted, having suffered through the past year with prolonged periods of under 50 percent occupancy. But critics say that the ministry's preparations for even four million visitors won't be ready in time, let alone six million. And the larger figures could result in a nightmarish shortage of accommodations.

Shlomo Ilya, director of the Israel 2000 Authority, expressed fears that Ben-Gurion Airport will not be able to handle increased traffic, and urged the government to make urgent plans to improve conditions at the airport in order to facilitate the arrival of tourists. Shortly after he spoke out, the government announced that border control would be moving from the responsibility of the police to the Ministry of the Interior.

Ilya also has nightmares about access to Christian holy sites, which are concentrated mainly in the Old City, where the narrow roads present serious transportation problems. He claims that the infrastructure just cannot accommodate more taxis and buses, and that gargantuan traffic jams are likely to ensue.

Despite the problems envisioned, the Ministry of Tourism and those in the industry remain optimistic, choosing to focus instead on the great opportunity that the year 2000 holds to put Israeli tourism back on the world map.

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

ISRAEL GEARS UP FOR MILLENNIUM WAVE

The Israel Government Tourist Office in Toronto recently launched a $250,000 marketing campaign aimed at persuading Christian Canadians to visit Israel during the coming Christian millennium year.

A series of print ads urge Canadians to celebrate the start of the world's next thousand years in Israel — "the land where time began" and "the official destination of the millennium." The ads are intended for the Toronto Star, Globe and Mail and several Christian publications.

The radio spots drive home a similar message by declaring that "Here in Canada, we measure time from day to day, week to week," but "Israel measures time from century to century, millennium to millennium."

Visitors to Israel are bound to notice the heightened preparations for the millennium. In many areas, but especially in Nazareth, Bethlehem and the Galilee, much construction of new roads and hotels is evident. Many homes and hostels are being converted to hotels to accommodate the wave of tourists.

Israel Trip for Students: Toronto Jewish high school students are invited to join a unique summer program in Ulpan Akivah, Netanya, Israel. Participants receive a complete immersion into Israeli culture and society with extensive touring, encounters with Israeli youth, seminars with leading Israeli public figures, and Hebrew lessons.

The subsidized cost, including flight, is $3,000. July 5 to 31. Contact Itia Golan, 905-886-6770 or Israel Experience, 398-6931.

New Hotel in Eilat: It's for good reason that the Red Sea port city of Eilat is sometimes called the Miami Beach of Israel. The recent opening of Herods Palace, a 330-room Sheraton luxury hotel, along with two other new facilities, will bring Eilat's hotel room total to roughly 12,000. The city's population is 50,000, which roughly translates into one hotel room for every four residents.

Herods Palace centres on historical themes from room decor to staff costumes, and includes a 64-room lifestyle and fitness resort as well as a meetings facility slated to open this summer. Incidentally, Eilat's sparkling new Sheraton has a Toronto connection as it was designed by Yoav Igra, a Toronto resident for some 30 years.

Frequent Flyer Bonus: El Al recently announced a reciprocal frequent flyer agreement with American Airlines — the first time Israel's national airline has entered into such an arrangement.

The agreement allows members of El Al's Matmid and Loyal Traveller Club to accumulate and redeem bonus points on all American Airlines and American Eagle flights. Accordingly, American Airlines Advantage members can also earn and exchange mileage for award tickets on El Al.

For further information, see the El Al web site at www.elal.com.

Let There Be Light: Beit Shean, one of Israel's most popular tourist attractions, is the site of the country's largest continuing archeological excavations. Beit Shean, located in the Jordan Valley southeast of Haifa, is a sort of Middle Eastern Pompeii — an ancient city buried beneath tonnes of earth. Much of Beit Shean has been uncovered, revealing Roman houses, streets, an amphitheatre and other impressive ruins.

Until now, Beit Shean has been a daylight destination: it's just too dark for visitors to enjoy once the sun goes down. However, the town recently hired an illuminations expert to brighten things up in order to attract restaurants, hotels, and, of course, tourists.

Crusaders at Israel Museum: Opening in July at the Israel Museum, Jerusalem, is Knights of the Cross: In the Path of the Crusaders. This exhibition provides a comprehensive history of the Crusades and their impact on the Land of Israel, through sculptures and reliefs, illuminated manuscripts, reliquaries, coins and many other art objects from the Crusader period.

The show commemorates 900 years since the First Crusade and the founding of the Crusader Kingdom. Until November. [www.imj.org.il.]

Realizing a vision: 'Hebrew-speaking' seeing-eye dogs

By RUTH HEIGES
WZPS

Motti Barzilai is the picture of confidence as he strides along the streets of Tel Aviv, gently issuing commands in Hebrew to Charlie, a chocolate-colored Labrador Retriever.

It's hard to believe that for 13 years Barzilai never left his home in Safed on his own. The fact that he can do so today is all due to Charlie, a "graduate" of the Israel Guide Dog Centre for the Blind.

"Isn't he the most beautiful dog you've ever seen," asks Barzilai, making it sound more like a statement than a question.

Though he had learned to use a long cane, Barzilai disliked the image this projected, preferring to navigate, instead, with his hand on the shoulder of a family member. A guide dog was out of the question. The woman who had once trained them in Israel had died years before, leaving no successor, so only those with a sufficient command of English and the financial means could obtain such dogs by travelling to the United States.

In spite of having been left visually impaired after a childhood mishap, Barzilai led a rich life, ultimately studying music and becoming director of a conservatory in Safed. Within the limited bounds of his world, he found ways to cope when he totally lost his residual vision 17 years ago.

While determined to continue leading a full life, he couldn't have known that a young Israeli had embarked on a mission; one which would have great impact on Barzilai's world. Noach Braun had plans to become a guide-dog trainer and mobility instructor, so that "Hebrew-speaking" dogs could be trained in Israel for appropriate candidates.

As he sits in the quiet gardens of the training centre, located at Moshav Beit Oved, near Rehovot, Braun finds it hard to explain what fired his determination to become a trainer. Having been a dog trainer during his army services and later working at the Hai Bar Nature Preserve, he was simply "looking for an occupation that would combine working with animals and people."

The long and difficult path he had to travel to accomplish this would have daunted anyone without such a sense of mission, but Braun and his future wife, Orna, whom he had met while living on Kibbutz Kabri, set off for the United States on a quest.

"I had no idea that the various training schools are in such intense competition with each other and that they are almost paranoid about taking in new people," Braun explains. "As an Israeli, and with no financial resources, I might as well have been from another planet."

Meanwhile, he started volunteering at the Jewish Guild for the Blind in New York, and contacted the Israeli Consulate in the hopes of connecting up with someone who could help him. This turned out to be Norman Leventhal, who had been involved in the Soviet Jewry Council of Greater Philadelphia. He received a call one day from the consul in charge of the Soviet Jewry desk.

"The name of the consul was Yeshaya Barzel," Leventhal relates, "and he told me that he had never met anyone so focused on what they wanted to do in life. I told him I had never met a blind person and didn't have a dog, but I'd be glad to meet the young man and help

These items are among the artifacts inaugurating the Israel Museum's millennial celebrations this summer. Spanning a period of 5,000 years, the exhibition, Drink and Be Merry: Wine and Beer in Ancient Times, traces the history of wine and beer in the land of Israel.

Featuring rare loans from international museums, the exhibition covers the period from the fourth millennium BCE to the Byzantine period in the fifth and sixth centuries CE., concentrating on history and archeology in ancient Israel.

The exhibition opens June 3 and runs through Jan. 1, 2000 in Jerusalem.

him if I could."

Once Leventhal and Braun met in December 1986, both of their lives changed. Through the combined efforts of the Jewish Guild for the Blind and Lions International, a partnership achieved by Leventhal, Braun was accepted for training at Pilot Dogs in Columbus, Ohio. This included arranging an annual grant for him that would be forgiven, gradually, if and when he returned to Israel and established a training centre. Ultimately, his wife Orna also participated in a course. Then, Leventhal arranged for Braun to undergo further training in England, at the Guide Dogs for the Blind Association.

"Noach kept in close contact with me," says Leventhal, "and I started to learn a little about why it was so important to have a guide dog centre in Israel. It didn't take much convincing to realize the importance of this humanitarian endeavor."

As a result, Leventhal and his wife travelled to Israel, met with guide-dog owners, and learned firsthand of the importance of having a school for training guide dogs in Israel. "Soon after, I made the decision to create a non-profit organization so we could raise funds to start the school, as Noach would need funding when he finished his training."

Soon, the man who had never met a blind person before nor owned a dog, established the Israel Guide Dog Centre for the Blind, a U.S. tax-exempt organization that supports the school and training centre in Israel. Between Leventhal's unflagging work in the United States and the dedicated work of Noach and Orna Braun in Israel, the lives of at least 20 blind Israelis and their families change every year.

At Beit Oved, operations are a family affair,with Orna supervising (and cleaning) the kennels and teaching the dogs discipline, and Noach involved in both training the dogs and overseeing a massive volunteer effort. The latter includes a large network of families who take care of puppies for a year, until they are old enough for training.

The centre has seven brood dogs, two at the centre and five with adoptive families, with each being bred once a year. In addition, suitable puppies are sent in from around the world; primarily Golden Retrievers, Labradors, and some German Shepherds. Veterinary expenses are covered by the centre. All supplies are provided to the foster families and to the centre, and the dogs are visited monthly to monitor progress. At the end of a year, the families hand the dogs over to commence the training process.

Once the dogs arrive at the centre, they are evaluated for temperament and other factors. If one is found unsuitable, the foster family is given first-refusal rights for adopting the dog. Then, those judged as good candidates start the six-month training program.

Braun has sponsored additional Israelis to become dog trainers and mobility instructors, and they now work with him. "I never again want it to happen – that Israel is left with a vacuum in this field," he says vehemently.

During the training period, the instructors work with each animal, both in the placid atmosphere of the moshav and in the noise of the city. They ride escalators in busy malls, travel on buses, go out into jostling crowds, banks, restaurants, grocery stores – every conventional, real-life environment where the dogs will be expected to serve.

Finally, the exciting day arrives when they are introduced to their future owners. Currently, the centre has living facilities for four people at a time. They spend three weeks at the centre with their designated dogs, learning how to work together as a team. Then, an additional week of instruction takes place in their own homes, with the trainer living in for that week.

This painstaking process yields only about 20 successful guide dogs per year, while about 80 people are waiting for them at any one time.

By the end of 1998, about 100 Israelis will have achieved their personal independence. One such graduate phoned the centre at the end of the first week on his own with his dog, having just returned from a walk in Tel Aviv: "It was like I was flying. I feel that I'm free as a bird."

Sophisticated technology helps solve country's water crisis

By SIMON GRIVER
WZPS

The nightmare scenario in which Israel would run out of water has finally been laid to rest, thanks to a sophisticated range of technologies that have been able to compensate for the lack of rainfall in the region.

This, together with efficient water management, has ensured that optimal use is made of the limited amount of water that Israel does have.

"Israel's water resources simply cannot meet future needs," explains Meirav Azulai, spokesperson for the government owned Mekorot Water Company, a public utility which has overall responsibility for developing the country's national water supply systems. "Consequently, we have had to focus on new technologies and more efficient systems."

The Heart of the Problem

At the heart of Israel's water problem is a semi-arid climate with regional and seasonal rainfall inequalities. Northern Israel enjoys a relatively generous annual average rainfall of 700 millimitres while the south receives just 20 mm in a year. But the abundant rainfall in the north and centre of Israel, though similar in amount to the annual precipitation in Western Europe, falls in just a few heavy storms between November and March. In addition, during the long, hot rainless summers, much of the water that is saved is lost through evaporation.

During 1997, Israelis used about two billion cubic metres of water. Mekorot supplied two-thirds of this amount, while municipalities and regional councils supplied the remainder from local wells. Agriculture used nearly half of the water consumed in Israel, domestic use accounting for 40 percent, and industry and other uses for the remainder.

Aquifers and the National Water Carrier

About one-third of the country's new water comes from the Sea of Galilee and the River Jordan which feeds it, while nearby, a third is contained in the Ta'ananim-Yarkon underground water arabesque which lies beneath Israel's inland plains between Haifa and Tel Aviv.

"In 1997 alone, we pumped 27 million cubic metres back into this and other aquifers," says Azulai, "to ensure that the underground water table did not get too low."

Israel has done remarkably well in making a limited amount of water go a long way. The National Water Carrier is one of the country's outstanding achievements, carrying water from the relatively wet north to the parched south. The invention of drip irrigation on Negev kibbutz Hatzerim in the 1960's was another factor in "making the desert bloom" and enabling the country to become self-sufficient in food, as well as export $1.5 billion (US) worth of fruit, vegetables, flowers and cotton each year.

Minimizing Water Loss and Inducing Rain

Computerized remote-controlled systems, as well as state-of-the-art monitoring, minimize water losses – a major problem even in the developed world. New seismological technologies have also assisted Mekorot in locating new underground wells. Furthermore, cloud seeding, which involves pilots flying into clouds and injecting them with iodine, thus inducing the clouds to release more water, has increased rainfall by an estimated 15 percent. Nevertheless, with Israel's current population of six million set to double in the next 40 years, it doesn't seem possible that water supply can keep pace with demand.

Purifying Sewage Water

But there are technological solutions. The first is sewage. A purification process has been developed which enables urban effluence to be cleaned and used for agriculture. Mekorot officials claim that the reclaimed water is clean enough to drink, but at present the Ministry of Health only allows the water to be used for agriculture. In 1997, Mekorot supplied Negev farmers with 129.4 million cubic metres of reclaimed water from the Greater Tel Aviv area. This amount is set to increase with sewage purification plants currently being constructed by the Ashdod, Netanya, Afula and Carmiel municipalities. Not only does sewage reclamation make a substantial amount of water available, it also offers environmental benefit as vast amounts of sewage are disposed off.

Desalination

However, the recycling of sewage water alone will not be able to meet Israel's future water demand. The real solution is desalination. Israel already has 24 desalination plants in the south, transforming the salty waters of the Red Sea and the saline geothermal waters beneath the Negev and Arava into fresh drinking water. In 1997, Mekorot supplied 44,000 cubic metres of desalinated water, including half of Eilat's water supply.

Yitzhak Kiriati, head of the Israel Export Institute's agricultural department, sees the country's pioneering reverse osmosis desalination technology as a major potential export industry.

"At present it costs us $1.20 to desalinate each cubic metre of water," he observes. "With technological fine-tuning and the construction of larger scale facilities we can probably get that cost down to 70 cents a cubic metre. For a development country like Israel, that's a small price to pay for guaranteed water supplies. But for the other countries in the Middle East and developing nations with a scarcity of water resources, desalination is probably too expensive a solution. Nevertheless, it can be an effective regional solution in some poorer countries that want to develop, say, a tourist infrastructure in an arid location."

The Galilee is a big attraction for Christians

By JOSEPH SERGE
Travel Editor

About six million visitors – mostly Christian pilgrims – are expected to visit Israel next year to mark the millennium.

The majority of these visitors will undoubtedly visit the Galilee region of Israel, where tradition holds Jesus spent most of his life.

Starting in Nazareth, this region can be done in a day on an organized tour, although a serious visitor will want to take more time.

Nazareth, traditionally the site Jesus grew up in, probably holds much disappointment for the pilgrims who flock here. The narrow streets are busy, and developments clutter the otherwise pretty hillside.

Of course, there are many churches here of various dominations. The most significant is the Basilica of the Annunciation – a modern structure built on the site where tradition holds an angel appeared to Mary and told her she was pregnant (the annunciation).

(Most of the churches here and other parts of Israel were built on traditional sites of some religious significance. Whether or not you believe the event in question took place on that site depends on your level of cynicism.)

You should know that the early Christians – many of whom believed in the imminence of the Messianic Age – did not attach any significance to the sites of Christ's life. It wasn't until the fifth century that Christians visited the Holy Land and started to build churches.)

This basilica is on the site of an 18th-century church, which itself was built over a fifth century Byzantine church. The basilica hosts a collection of murals depicting Mary and Jesus, donated from Christian churches worldwide. Unfortunately, the Canadian contribution is probably the least imaginative.

For the record, the Greek Orthodox operate another church, St.Gabriel's, where they claim the annunciation took place. Of significance here is a spring which supplies Mary's Well, which is said to have healing powers.

Just northeast of Nazareth is Cana, the site Christians believe Jesus performed his first miracle, turning water into wine at a wedding. Of course, a church stands at the site this miracle took place, this one a Franciscan church. Since this church was built on the site of an ancient synagogue – the traditional meeting place for Jews of Christ's era– it is likely that the miracle did in fact take place here.

Churches commemorate sites of Gospel stories

Not far from here is an excellent panoramic site, Mount Tabor. Christians believe this is the site of Jesus' transfiguration, when he was seen talking with Moses and Elijah. Two churches on the summit – one Franciscan, one Greek – commemorate this event. At a height of 580 metres, the view is absolutely stunning.

North of Nazareth is Tiberias and the Sea of Galilee (Kinneret). It is in Capernaum in Tiberias that Jesus began his ministry, and some of his apostles were fishermen from this fresh-water sea.

Tiberias is also one of Israel's holiest cities to Jews as it was here that the Mishnah was completed and vowels, and punctuation added to the Hebrew alphabet.

In Capernaum you can visit the remains of an old synagogue. Across from this is St. Peter's Church (Terra Sancta), a small church built in the shape of a fishing boat.

Down on the Sea of Galilee, you should take a boat ride. After a day travelling through the hot, desert climate, this 35-minute peaceful ride is sure to be refreshing.

Sticking to the "when in Rome..." tradition of travelling, you might want to try a St. Peter's Fish dinner in Tiberias, although it isn't cheap.

North of Tiberias is Migdal (Magdala), the birthplace of Mary Magdalene. Of course a church marks the site of her house.

Slightly further north is Tabgha, a serene place which houses the Church of the Multiplication of the Loaves and Fishes. Built over a fourth-century church, the current building was built in 1936. At the foot of the altar is an ancient mosaic depicting two fish and a basket of loaves.

Another church, the Church of the Primacy of Peter, is supposed to be built on the site where Jesus appeared to Peter following his resurrection. There is a flat rock in front of the altar, which it is said was the table at which Jesus and his disciples ate.

The Church of the Mount of Beatitudes commemorates the place Jesus gave one of his more popular sermons.

The River Jordan at Kibbutz Kinneret is green, lush and beautiful. Many Christians, like this group of Eastern Orthodox, make a special pilgrimage to this point on the river to be baptized. [Joseph Serge photos]

Finally, not far from Tiberias, is Kibbutz Kinneret, which many Christian pilgrims flock to because of the baptism site on the River Jordan. The river here is very green, lush and beautiful, and if you time it right you can watch groups of new Christians being baptized. Already-baptized Christians also walk in to get their feet wet in the "holy water".

What they might not know, perhaps, is that Jesus would have been baptized a lot further south near Jericho in the West Bank, but for strategic locations that area is closed to visitors.

Egged Tours runs day-long visits to these sites from most hotels in Jerusalem or Tel-Aviv. Although be warned, they are quick "now you see it, now you don't" tours. The only good thing is that after visiting these sites you can climb back on the bus and close your eyes for the two-hour journey back to Jerusalem.

If you do manage to stay awake, there's a fair amount of interesting sites along the main road, including lots of fruit-filled kibbutzim, and various Bedouin settlements along the dry, sun-drenched desert.

Joseph Serge travelled to Israel courtesy of El Al, and in Jerusalem was a guest of the Sheraton Plaza Hotel.

The Science Garden is full of wonder and adventure

By RUTH HEIGES
WZPS

A wave machine rises into the sky; the TrampoLuna cuts one's weight to only one-sixth, simulating the feeling one might have walking on the moon; a full rainbow materializes in full-circle glory, rivaling nature in a way that would have cheered Noah.

Scientific experiments have burst out of the laboratories of the Weizmann Institute of Science, transforming part of the pastoral campus into a landscape which children might see as a giant's playground. For the young, it's a day at a theme park. For the inquisitive, it's fun with science on the grandest scale imaginable. For all, it's an experience filled with wonder.

Based on the success of a pilot consisting of 30 hands-on installations manifesting scientific principles, the internationally renowned research centre has given over a number of acres of its campus in Rehovot to an expanded adventure of 100 installations for children, youth and their families.

Some of the installations represent ongoing research at the institute, with all laboratory elements replicated. These include elaborate water systems and arrays of solar collectors, the latter used for powering some of the exhibits or serving as a functional element. The water height of a solar-powered fountain, for instance, is dependent upon available sunlight. Visitors are able to manipulate the various components and observe the immediate effects of their actions.

The Boyo is designed as a giant yo-yo in reverse, where the visitor does the moving while the yo-yo stays in its cradle. [WZPS photo]

"The word experiment shares the same root as the word experience," notes Hanan Alon, vice-president of international affairs and public relations. "We have tried to create a visit that is just that – turning our world of research and experiment into an unforgettable experience, which we now invite the public to share."

The name, The Clore Garden of Science, might make for a hard sell

Increasing our sense of wonder

when you next bring your children to Israel. The promise of a genuine adventure, however, should quickly persuade them.

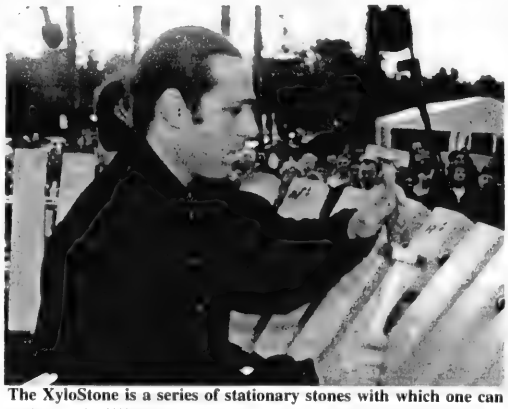
Going well beyond the "please touch" concept of some science museums, the visitor is even invited to climb onto some of the installations to activate them, such as the gigantic Archimedean Screw, which makes water flow up.

It also goes beyond the scale of similar concepts at the science centres in India and the New York Hall of Science, where the outdoor installations are an adjunct to the buildings housing the main exhibits. Blessed with both space and Israel's temperate climate, over 90 percent of the Weizmann facility is outdoors, with indoor areas simply providing ancillary services such as a restaurant and gift shop.

"Not only is the sky not the limit, it is an element in the presentations," notes Dr. Moshe Rishpon, director of the Youth Activities Section, which operates the Clore Garden of Science. "The sun, for example, is the necessary partner to the Full Rainbow, while a sprinkler system provides the water.

"In another installation," he adds, "the sun's rays on a model of the planet earth, positioned on the correct axis, show the status of a day and night around the world. For other phenomena, we've created exhibits from our imaginations, like the Monkey Man, whose crazy gyrations demonstrate chaos theory. Cumulatively, we are trying to convey a single unifying message – that, through enlightenment, science can increase our sense of wonder."

For now, installations represent only the physical sciences. But thought already is being given to how some of the breakthrough biological and other research being conducted at the institute can be manifested in the future. Meanwhile, the expanded park is expected to attract some 150,000 visitors annually, compared to the 20,000 who visited during the pilot stage.



The XyloStone is a series of stationary stones with which one can make music. [WZPS photo courtesy of the Weizmann Institute]

The institute has also created a self-guided tour around other parts of the campus. The Levinson Sci-Trek features 11 ViewPoints at key locations, chosen for their significance to the history of the institute or to the scientific research conducted in the nearby labs. At each station, the visitor can enjoy a multimedia presentation on the science and the sites around that particular ViewPoint.

Finally, visitors also have the opportunity to meet "the ghost of Chaim Weizmann" in a multi-media program starring Ha'im Topol. The show is presented in the auditorium of the new Levinson Visitors Centre, which also features a coffee shop and a gift shop.

By the spring of 1999, it is hoped that restoration work on Weizmann House will have been completed. Curiously, the home of Chaim Weizmann – a scientist and Israel's first president for whom the institute was named – which is adjacent to the campus, had not been part of the institute's domain until 18 months ago. Since receiving responsibility for this historic home from the government, the institute has undertaken renewal of the house and its grounds. Upon completion of the renovation, Weizmann House will also become part of the visitor's experience.

"The art of today is the environment of yesterday, and by the same token, the science of today is the environment of tomorrow," was the philosophy expressed by the late Prof. Amos de-Shalit, whose vision led to the establishment of the institute's Youth Activities Section.

This distinguished nuclear physicist, who was a dedicated educator, maintained: "Both have to be taught to children in order to provide for the continuity of the human race and to develop respect for its place on earth."

Creation of the dynamic new visiting experience is fitting testimony to this concept.

Jewish National Fund a major force in early Israeli film

By HILLEL TRYSTER
WZPS

Probably the most famous footage associated with the birth of the State of Israel 51 years ago, is that of David Ben Gurion reading the Declaration of Independence.

That we have this image in our mind's eye, is due to photographer Natan Axelrod, proprietor of the Carmel newsreel. The fact that he was on hand at all may be credited largely to the Jewish National Fund (JNF) for having kept Axelrod and his enterprise afloat over the years.

Though Axelrod was apparently not the only cameraman there, and though his original soundtrack seems to have gone astray (most documentaries since then feature a badly synchronized, independent sound recording), it is his vantage point that has survived.

JNF was a major force in local film from the lean years of World War II, playing a greater role than is generally realized in the minor boom of the late '40s and early '50s, and supporting a fairly steady stream of documentaries, news items, and sometimes entire newsreels. Interesting documentary work was sometimes also purchased from foreign filmmakers, if considered useful or relevant.

In the late '30s, JNF was approached by a German immigrant, Lasar Duenner, who offered his services as a filmmaker. JNF was warned that Duenner was unreliable and prone to exaggeration, but luckily the warning was not heeded, for this inauspicious beginning blossomed into the most prolific of all JNF film relationships, lasting several decades.

Immediately after the war, Duenner shot large quantities of color 16 mm footage (he was among the first in the country to specialize in the medium) and is responsible for much of the post-war, pre-state color films.

JNF's Land of Hope (1945-46), the surviving print of which unfortunately lacks cinematography credits, opened with horrific European concentration camp scenes and an address by future U.S. Ambassador to Israel James McDonald. In stark contrast, the rest of the film showed the work of "upbuilding" in Palestine, with narration by then up-and-coming American actor Jose Ferrer. The emphasis in Behind the Blockade (1947), as one might guess from its title, was also "upbuilding," in spite of British restrictions on Jewish immigration, and was narrated by Hollywood actor John Carradine.

In 1946, JNF brought to the screen a dramatic episodic feature, The Great Promise, which was designed to reach a wider audience. The film devices used by Polish director Joseph Leyets, may seem transparent to today's audiences, but The Great Promise nevertheless remains a highly worthy effort and has become a valuable document of its time.

The film opens in a concentration camp, where three Jewish Brigade soldiers encounter a Holocaust survivor who has lost all hope. The stories they each tell him of life in Palestine are clearly designed to communicate as much information about the country as possible.

One soldier tells of his last home leave in his settlement during harvest time; another tells of a little girl brought from Europe who eventually adjusts to a life of freedom on a kibbutz. The third soldier tells the story of a trip he took up the Jordan River's course from north to south, through the Hula Valley, the Naharayim power plant, all the way to the Dead Sea.

Hot on the heels of The Great Promise came a full-length feature film, My Father's House. This important film of the mid-'40s was written by Meyer Levin, who later made his historical documentary The Illegals. It was directed by Herbert Kline, who had made The Forgotten Village with writer John Steinbeck in 1941, and was produced by both men.

Whether this description aptly reflects precisely who did what remains a moot question, as Kline and Kevin quarreled bitterly over the credits, and before it was all over, one JNF representative went on record as saying that he had never worked with two such difficult people.

My Father's House told of a young Holocaust survivor who comes ashore as an "illegal" immigrant to Palestine, and refusing to believe his father has not survived the war, searches for him all over the country – a deliberate device used to exhibit various features of the yishuv (the pre-State Jewish community in Palestine) – including the Dead Sea Works and the Palestine Philharmonic Orchestra. The cameraman of this excellent film was Floyd Crosby, an Oscar-winner for the 1931 film Tabu.

Many kibbutz members at that time were amateur photographers, and some of them attained a professional level. One of the most prominent was Mishmar HaEmek's Yoel Lotan (Yolek). His color footage of the kibbutz during the War of Independence was so outstanding that JNF sponsored its transformation into a documentary entitled Heritage.

In 1950, JNF also assisted the UJA/Foundation Fund in its dramatic production of Song of the Negev, inspired by the resistance of Beit Eshel (one of JNF's 1943 Negev outposts) during Israel's War of Independence. The director was again Joseph Leytes, and the film's high point was a self-sacrificing dash by a defender of the settlement to retrieve a package of medical supplies and food. He was inadvertently parachuted into no-man's-land.

The longed-for transformation from war refugee to war hero had finally been achieved.

Journalists examine their craft

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Shi Davidi of Canadian Press, Rebecca Eckler of the National Post and Leah Rumack of Now magazine are not much older (in some cases, younger) than the students they addressed at the recent Afterword conference.

The trio offered tips and encouragement to some 30 aspiring media types in the session Young, Jewish and Jobs in Journalism, at Canada's first national Jewish student journalism conference.

The three-day event, held at B'nai Brith Canada headquarters, was the brainchild of Dave Gordon, who had attended a similar conference in New York.

"I thought it was great," said Ryerson Polytechnic University journalism student Amy Lerman. "It was neat to meet other journalism students and a good opportunity to hear journalists."

Speakers included Toronto Sun editor Lorrie Goldstein; CBC's Evan Solomon, co-founder of Shift magazine; radio talk show host Marsha Lederman of Talk 640; Mitchel Raphael of the National Post and CKLN Radio; CBC's Ralph Benmergui; filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici; Daniel Horowitz, editor of B'nai Brith Canada's Jewish Tribune; TV Ontario's Steve Paikin; author/poet Libby Scheier; CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat; the National Post's Eliot Zimelman; and Michael Posner of the Globe and Mail.

Being a journalist can be one of the most fun jobs or one of the worst, said Davidi, 23. "You get access to things the general public doesn't, but it also means following people around who don't want to talk to you."

He advised students to write for their campus publications, as a good way to develop their own style.

Eckler, 25, found it "unhelpful" for teachers to stress how difficult it is to get a job in journalism.

Always put something personal or quirky in cover letters, she suggested. "Use your connections. If you don't have any, make some."

Students should make the most of their jobs, she said. Before writing for the Post, Eckler served water to guests as an unpaid intern for Pamela Wallin Live. Once she spoke up, she began researching and producing shows, which led to a full-time job.

Some of her tips were:

- Act smarter than you are. If you don't recognize a name, pretend you do, then "race to the Internet" to find out more.
- Be nice. Try not to get involved in office politics.
- Work hard, hard, hard.

Rumack – a 26-year-old with a nose ring, blue hair and fingernails to match – said being young isn't a disadvantage in alternative media.

But she almost blew her chance at Now. Having worked at the gay magazine Xtra as a student, she was asked to write something for Now's Pride Day issue on looking different and being lesbian.

"I can't, because I'm not," she answered.

"I heard this death silence," she said. She tried to recoup. "Let me write something else. If you don't like it, you don't have to take it." Her quick thinking led to an interview and a job. "It was the smartest 10 seconds of my life."

In the final session, Lorrie Goldstein and Evan Solomon spoke on Crossing the Distance of Jewish Words: Jewish Presence in the Media.

Preparing for the session was educational, Goldstein said. The Toronto Sun editor hadn't realized how much he wrote about his Jewishness until a computer search showed 145 entries dating from 1989.

"Jewishness is part of who I am," he said. "It comes through in my writing."

Solomon has concluded that journalism is a Jewish quest, because of its storytelling and question-asking aspects. "Judaism is the only culture that has ever used literacy as a rite of passage," he said.

During the question period, Solomon noted that he and his Shift co-founders, then in their early 20s, had "stupidity" and adaptability on their side. "If you really know, you become afraid," he said. "Just go for it."

Goldstein is inundated with submissions at the Sun. He probably throws out "stuff that's pretty good because the person hasn't gotten my attention first. How to get my attention? Call and call and call and call."

Likely candidates to work at the Sun are "bright, curious, articulate...not poisoned with ideology."

Michaella Etienne, a student at the University of Moncton, appreciated the speakers' generosity in sharing "the tricks of the trade."

It was interesting to hear how some of the speakers began their careers, added York University student Zack Medicoff.

For Keren Markuze, a communications major at Concordia entering broadcast journalism at the University of Southern California, the conference served as "sort of a refreshing reintroduction to journalism."

the NDP's Norm Jesin. Kwinter polled 19,475 votes, to 8,829 for Hausman and 3,472 for Jesin.

Winning the riding seemed easy for Kwinter, but the battle to become the Liberal candidate there wasn't. He was challenged for the nod by fellow Liberal Annamarie Castrilli in a nasty fight that saw several anonymous anti-Semitic missives directed at Kwinter.

Instead, Castrilli ran for the Conservatives in Parkdale-High Park, where she was soundly defeated by high-profile Liberal Gerard Kennedy.

A big upset took place in St. Paul's, where Citizenship and Culture Minister Isabel Bassett was defeated by Liberal Michael Bryant by over 4,000 votes. The riding, which at the federal level has been a bellwether for years, includes affluent neighborhoods like Forest Hill, and is about 20 percent Jewish.

Bryant focused on the working class areas east of Yonge Street and south of St. Clair Avenue, and won a lot of support there.

Broadcaster Larry Solway of the NDP polled 3,369 votes, considered respectable given that St. Paul's is not traditionally New Democrat territory.

In Willowdale, the victory by David Young, a Jewish former North York Board of Education trustee, wasn't a surprise. The riding was held previously by Attorney General Charles Harnick, who announced earlier this year that he would not seek re-election.

Young polled just over 22,000 votes, to 18,500 for his nearest rival, Fahimeh Mortazavi of the Liberals. Jewish NDP candidate Mikael Swayze received 1,846 ballots.

In Eglinton-Lawrence, two high-profile MPPs slugged it out, but Liberal Mike Colle came out on top, defeating Michael Parker by over 6,000 votes. Jay Waterman of the NDP received 1,377 votes.

The new riding includes the heavily Jewish Bathurst Street corridor between Chaplin Crescent and the 401, a large Orthodox population in the Bathurst-Lawrence area, and many chassidic families south of Wilson on Bathurst.

Parker was among the few Tories to publicly state that he supports government funding for private schools.

In Oak Ridges, home to over 7,500 Jewish residents, most of them in Richmond Hill, Tory Frank Klees cruised to an easy win, part of the PC sweep of the 905 region.

Klees almost doubled his nearest rival, Liberal Vito Spatafora, a long-time Richmond Hill councillor, by 27,000 votes to 14,689. The NDP's Chris Moise got 1,774 votes.

York Region's booming Jewish community lost two representatives who had been in cabinet and may return there: Al Palladini and David Tsubouchi, both of whom were re-elected but in largely non-Jewish ridings.

Vicky Wylson-Sher, a Jewish community activist in Hamilton, ran as a Liberal in Wentworth-Burlington, but lost to Tory Toni Skarica by over 11,000 votes.

The Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress extended its congratulations to Harris, saying the premier "clearly won a mandate" to continue his course.

Region chair Keith Landy said Congress will hold the premier to his pledge to discuss the provision of health services in independent and religious schools.

Landy added that the Jewish community will keep pressing for public funding of the core curriculum in private schools.

"If [Harris] is fair-minded on this issue, then he will come to the realization that this is something the community is entitled to," Landy told The CJN the morning after the election.

Congress had identified four issues of concern to the Jewish community in the election: funding the non-religious curriculum and health services in private schools, social housing, elder care, and hate on the Internet, which the federal government recently said it would not regulate.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Last week we began a two-part exploration of parliamentary travel.

We concluded that there was some benefit to participation in obligatory meetings of the Inter-Parliamentary Union and the like; considerable value in the travel associated with House of Commons or Senate committee business; and virtually no merit in the Team Canada enterprise.

Now, let's make good on the promise to consider the juicy side of parliamentary travel – political junkets. Strictly speaking, political junkets are trips sponsored by third parties, which are offered to MPs or senators.

Of course, that's a broad definition, and the legitimacy of the trips within that category varies widely. Some politicians refuse to participate on such excursions as a matter of principle, while others seek out every opportunity to "score a freebie."

Some trips are heavy on the glamor and thin on the substance. Parliamentarians are showered with attention and souvenirs throughout the trip. If they return to Canada exhausted, it is only due to the brief respites between meals.

On the other extreme, there are trips sponsored by groups who can barely scrape the funds together to organize a parliamentary trip, however modest.

For its part, the Jewish community routinely sponsors trips all over the world. During its heyday, various Soviet Jewry groups frequently brought parliamentarians over to the former Soviet Union to meet with Refusniks – to great effect.

Today, both Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith organize tours to Washington and Europe to focus political attention on the issues pertaining to the Holocaust and Nazi war criminals. The Canada Israel Committee's parliamentary trips to Israel are amongst the most sought after on the Hill.

Good or bad, what all of these programs share in common is the need to "sell" their products to politicians in the most effective way possible and nothing creates a more powerful impression than the product itself.

American politicians have huge budgets which can be used for fact-finding missions. An MP's budget barely covers the cost of a skeleton staff. Canadian politicians rely on junkets to learn about the world.

It's good to know that Israel and other issues of importance to the Jewish community are on the itinerary.

Holocaust symposium held

By WENDY GOLDBLATT SCHNEIDER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — The Hamilton Holocaust education committee recently held its annual symposium on the Holocaust at McMaster University.

The event, now in its sixth year, has become increasingly popular, attracting more than 400 high school students from numerous schools in the area.

Unlike previous years, when students from all disciplines were invited to attend, schools, this year, were asked to restrict attendance to 15 students from the history department only.

Keynote speaker Rabbi Joseph Polak of Boston, gave an engaging presentation. A child survivor, he addressed issues of particular concern to young people.

He asked them to imagine what it would be like to have their lives uprooted, to be forced to attend separate schools and then to watch the disappearance of classmates, who were taken from their homes in the middle of the night.

Questions

Striding up and down the aisles of a large university classroom, the rabbi asked probing and provocative questions like, who did the students think took the family sofa or drank his unfinished glass of orange juice?

"When I know who drank my orange juice," he said, "I will know who perpetrated the Holocaust."

His message came across loud and clear. He said it was not the SS, nor unspecified Germans who ransacked his family's home; it was their Dutch neighbors, who had lived next to them for years.

Students were equally engrossed by Polak's account of his family's experience in the Star camp at Bergen Belsen and on a lost transport that tragically departed from the camp just days before the arrival of the allied forces.

During the second part of the symposium students were divided into groups to hear further testimony from other survivors.

Holocaust education committee member, Bev Lasky, explained that there is a sense of urgency as local survivors are aging and find the prospect of recounting painful personal memories year after year increasingly difficult.

This year, for the first time, five survivors were asked to come in from Toronto to make up the difference.

"We've always felt that teaching the history of the event is not our job," Lasky said. "My goal is that students remember just one thing; That they can say to their children and grandchildren, that it really happened because they heard it from a survivor."

Gesher launches Holocaust exhibit

By DAVID LITVAK
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The Gesher project is launching an exhibit of painting and poetry created by Holocaust survivors and their children.

The Gesher exhibit, to be held at the Holocaust Education Centre, runs from June 20 to mid-September

The Gesher project is an intergenerational program designed to create bridges between Holocaust survivors and their children.

Alina Wydra, a psychologist and a child of Holocaust survivors is a founding member of the Gesher project. She said the idea for the group came about as a result of discussions she held with Dale Adams-Segal, a writer who does healing workshops with writing.

Wydra had been had been helping trauma victims in the native community and decided she wanted to take her work to her own community, she said.

Local artist Linda Dayan Frimmer, who had previous experience with cultural bridging through a collaborative project for strengthening ties between native and Jewish communities, and writer Reisa Schneider were invited to join Wydra and Adams-Segal in the founding of Gesher, which means bridge in the Hebrew.

Gesher aims to bridge the gap between Holocaust survivors and their children through an interdisciplinary therapeutic approach, which combines writing and painting with psychology.

At the Gesher project's inaugural meeting, which included the four founders and 18 others, participants discussed themes of the Holocaust. and explored their experiences through writing and painting.

The creative output of this and later meetings developed into the Gesher exhibit. A book is also planned.

"It was amazing for survivors to hear what children of other survivors had to say, and it resulted in a lot of new understanding and connection," Wydra said.

For more information about the exhibit, call 604-733-4321 or e-mail posthuma@axionet.com.

Peace prospects welcome

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — When Yechiel Bar Chaim, the Paris-based Yugoslavia program director for the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), checked his e-mail last week, he found a message from a Yugoslav correspondent.

"PEAAACCCE!" the message said. "The Yugoslav Parliament accepted!!!!!!!"

The prospect of a halt to NATO's air war against Serbia came as welcome news to Yugoslavia's 3,500 Jews, who throughout the NATO campaign have shared the same fears as their Serbian neighbors.

"I am desperate, hopeless, and very, very tired," Belgrade Jewish community activist Misa David told the 600 delegates to the General Assembly of the European Council of Jewish Communities, held in Nice at the end of last month.

"The people in Yugoslavia, suffer twice – from [President Slobodan] Milosevic's regime and from the NATO bombing."

Jews now share fears for the future in a country whose infrastructure has been pulverized, whose economy has been shattered, and whose social and political order is in turmoil.

"As a Jewish community, we are trying to prepare a program for the future," David said in an interview. "But we will need help from all Jewish organizations."

A first priority, Bar Chaim added, would be to help the Yugoslav Jews currently being hosted in Budapest, to return home. About 200 of these people went on to Israel.

Other JDC priorities include:

• emergency cash relief for the elderly, who include as many as 800 destitute Holocaust survivors;

• new shipments of medicine to replenish the pharmacy in Belgrade, which was set up long before the conflict, and was maintained with the help of World Jewish Relief;

• refurbishment of the kitchen in the Belgrade community and the possible opening of soup kitchens in the Belgrade and Novi Sad communities; and

• expanded non-sectarian medical aid, to supplement medicines already provided for the sick and wounded in the Pristina Hospital and for autistic children in Belgrade.

Throughout the NATO campaign, Yugoslav Jewry's strong central organization helped sustain a semblance of normality for Jews in Belgrade.

Electric power and water were cut; bombs and missiles destroyed buildings, roads and bridges; ear-splitting air raid sirens sent people for shelters; and food and other consumer goods were either rationed or in short supply. But Jews kept up a proud facade of business as usual.

This was partly the result of contingency measures adopted months before the air strikes began. Besides arranging for hundreds of Jews to travel to Hungary, these measures included assembling stockpiles of medicine and other essentials, and making provisions for temporary housing for people afraid or unable to stay in their homes.

"We stopped most communal activities for about a month after the bombing started," David said, "but then we started up again.

"The Maccabi sports club began operating again, the choir went ahead with its rehearsals," he said. "We even kept publishing the community newsletter."

Community leaders in Belgrade, David said, maintained daily phone contact with the eight smaller communities in the provinces and provided emergency aid if needed.

Yugoslavia's Jews, though not strong supporters of Milosevic, tended to share the basic Serbian political position on the war.

As such, they felt isolated from much of the Jewish world. They complained about "one-sided" support by foreign Jews and Jewish organizations for the Kosovar refugees and the NATO bombing campaign.

Some Belgrade Jews also expressed disappointment that the Israeli ambassador to Belgrade closed the embassy and left Yugoslavia shortly after the beginning of the air strikes.

"It is difficult for me to understand what the west intended to do with this type of campaign," one community member, who did not want to be quoted by name, told JTA before the peace accord was reached.

"The NATO attack essentially killed any opposition. It gave Milosevic the excuse to abolish normal civil rights, to impose martial law, tough restrictions on everyone," the community member added.

"I hate Milosevic, but I hate the bombing – you cannot maintain a pro-western position when you are under such attack. He admitted, however, that Yugoslavs, Jewish or not, were largely in the dark about what had happened in Kosovo.

"I know what the western news reports say, but I cannot believe it. Or, probably, we don't like to believe it."

Barak prefers Shas

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Sources in One Israel say that Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak has decided he prefers Shas to the Likud as a coalition partner, because the positions presented by Likud leader Ariel Sharon are guaranteed to obstruct any progress on the peace front, while Shas will be a loyal partner in a coalition aimed at making a breakthrough in the peace process.

But the "open door" to Shas, as Barak called it in an interview, creates a new difficulty, as Meretz and Shinui hold fast to their position that they will not serve in a coalition that includes Shas.

According to Shlomo Ben-Ami, a top negotiator for One Israel, Deri's resignation from the Knesset and from the political leadership of Shas, satisfies him that Shas is no longer tainted by having a convicted criminal at its head. "I wonder what else Deri has to do? Is anyone suggesting that his phones be wiretapped to make sure nobody is consulting with him?" Ben-Ami asked rhetorically.

However, despite the apparent progress – including Shas sources saying that arrangements are being made for a Barak meeting with Rabbi Ovadiah Yosef, the spiritual leader of Shas – One Israel has a problem with two of its more natural coalition partners, Meretz and Shinui, who are sticking to their guns about not serving in the same government with Shas.

In related developments, Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak was scheduled to meet alone with Yisrael b'Aliyah leader Natan Sharansky to discuss cabinet portfolios, even though Sharansky's representative to the coalition talks is still complaining that One Israel's government guidelines concerning settlements are unacceptable.

But One Israel sources say there is no crisis in the negotiations with Yisrael b'Aliyah.

Yisrael b'Aliyah's chief coalition negotiator, Yuli Edelstein, has said that "it goes without saying" that the Interior Ministry will be going to his party.

'Righteous' status sought for Jersey hero

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Unlike the legendary Oskar Schindler, Albert Gustave Bedane's acts of courage were not enacted in the horror-filled world of wartime Poland.

His heroism was played out on British soil – on the Nazi-occupied Channel Island of Jersey, which now glories in a reputation as a tax haven and home to the super-rich.

After a result of the efforts of an amateur historian in Jersey, the London-based Holocaust Educational Trust has launched a campaign to convince the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem to make Bedane a Righteous Among the Nations.

Most of Jersey's pre-war Jewish population had left before the Nazi invasion in June 1940.

A total of 12 islanders who were registered as Jews, were deported. The Jewish community of Jersey now numbers about 150.

When the Nazis invaded the tranquil island, Bedane, a French-born veteran of World War I, was a successful physiotherapist with a thriving practice in Jersey's capital, St. Helier.

During the occupation, which ended in 1945, German officers frequently sought out Bedane in his rambling five-story home – now a hotel – to soothe their aching limbs.

What the Germans did not know, was that while Bedane was treating them in his clinic, much of the rest of the building was hiding escaped prisoners of war, escaped slave laborers – and a small, middle-aged, Dutch-born Jewish woman, Mary Erica Richardson.

While Richardson is the only Jew definitively known to have been saved by Bedane, it is assumed that he also harbored others during the war.

If any of the people he kept secretly at his home had been discovered by the Nazi occupiers, Bedane knew he would have been shot.

Among those "guests" was Richardson, the Jewish wife of a retired, non-Jewish British sea captain, who hid in an ancient stone cellar barely 4½-feet high.

She had escaped from the back door of her apartment while her husband, pretending to be senile, had kept the Germans who had come to arrest her waiting at the front door.

Despite efforts to find her, in which Nazi officials were aided by Jersey's attorney general and local police, Richardson remained safe in Bedane's home until the Nazi retreat at the end of the war.

The only surviving guest that Bedane sheltered, is 87-year-old Francis Le Sueur, an islander who was wanted by the Germans for his activities in the Jersey underground.

Now living near the town of Dinard in northern France, Le Sueur vividly recalls playing cards with Richardson before he decided to take his chances and escape to France.

Jewish woman in hiding

He also remembers his first encounter with Bedane. "When I arrived, he showed me into a windowless room, little bigger than a cubicle, which had perhaps once been used for patients. Bedane said to me: 'You're going to stay in this room and I don't want you to come out.' But I was just one of many, many."

Recently, Le Sueur described how Bedane had confided in him that Richardson was hiding because she was Jewish.

"I remember we discussed this matter quite fully, as the question of race and religion was, and still is to me, a matter of small importance."

Bedane's wife, Clara, died during the war, and his daughter Valerie May, was last heard of living in Australia in the 1950s.

Not surprisingly, perhaps, the anxiety of the period took its toll on Bedane.

He collapsed soon after the war and was admitted to a hospital, where he was diagnosed as suffering from the delayed effects of chronic stress.

Suffered chronic stress

When he died in 1970 at the age of 76, his acts of selfless heroism were neither recognized nor rewarded by the west.

His sole memento was an inscribed gold watch, a gift from the Soviet government in appreciation for the Russian slave laborers he had saved.

Richardson and her husband left the island immediately after the war.

The last trace of her is a letter she wrote to Bedane from a clinic in Austria thanking him for having saved her life.

The Holocaust Educational Trust, headed by Lord Janner, has only recently learned of Bedane's wartime heroism through the efforts of a 42-year-old Jersey property dealer and amateur local historian, Frederick Cohen.

"As president of the Jewish community in Jersey, I felt I had an obligation to record the story," Cohen said in an interview.

"And once I started, I carried on until I had completed the record."

Janner says his organization is submitting Bedane's name to Yad Vashem because it is satisfied, having seen the documentation and having heard the evidence, that "he was a hero and should be honored."

The request to Yad Vashem has also been endorsed by Britain's former chief rabbi, Lord Immanuel Jakobovits, and David Cesarani, director of the Wiener Library, a London-based Holocaust documentation centre.

"Little was known until now, but he saved many lives, including that of Mrs Richardson, for whom he risked everything," says Janner.

According to Janner, Bedane "fulfils every criteria for recognition" by Yad Vashem. "There was never any suggestion that he sought or received payment or reward for his courageous acts," he adds.

The Week in Israel

May 31

• The U.S. State Department called the plan to extend the borders of the Ma'aleh Adumim four miles westward to Jerusalem, "a provocative act by an outgoing government."

• Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak opposes the construction of new Jewish settlements in the West Bank, but would allow for the natural growth of existing ones, according to the coalition guidelines he drew up. The Likud, National Religious Party and Meretz gave their preliminary approvals to the guidelines.

June 1

• For the first time since his defeat, outgoing Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met with Barak. In an hour-long breakfast meeting, the two men discussed security and political issues during the transfer of power.

June 2

• Netanyahu convened an emergency meeting of the security cabinet to hear from army officials about stepped-up Hezbollah operations in south Lebanon in the wake of the withdrawal by the South Lebanon Army (SLA) from the Jezzine enclave in the south.

June 3

• The SLA completed its withdrawal from the Christian Jezzine enclave north of the security zone. Ending 14 years of control over the enclave, the SLA left a trail of abandoned equipment as it made a hasty retreat to Israeli positions within the zone.

• Eighteen Palestinians and six IDF soldiers were injured as a result of violent demonstrations in the West Bank and Gaza as a Day of Rage protesting Israel's settlement policy. The Palestinian Authority (PA) did not manage to rally the crowds it had anticipated.

• Ehud Barak warned PA Chairman Yasser Arafat against a resumption of terrorism. Speaking in the wake of the Day of Rage, Barak said the government would not be intimidated and that if attacks resumed, there would be no peace process.

Vancouver child finishes near top in Israel competition

Barzilai said he studied for four months for the competition, which covered issues including the principles of Israel's declaration of Independence, the history of Jerusalem, the wars of Israel, aliyah, authors and poets of Israel, and Jewish ethnic communities. The study guide was produced in English, Hebrew, French, Russian and Spanish.

Barzilai said he chose to enter the competition "because of the knowledge," and because his 13-year-old brother, Zohar, was here last year. "He inspired me."

"I think it was a great achievement," said Dr. Yaacov Eliav, director of the International Centre for Jewish Identity at BIU. "[The students] gain quite a lot. We took a difficult topic, Jewish heritage, and we succeeded. From all over the world, they were so eager to come. It's great fun."

The trip officially began on May 24, with touring in the Tel Aviv area. The group then toured the north and south of the country. "Jerusalem was my favorite place," said Barzilai. His parents are Israeli, but this was his first trip to Israel. "It's the thing that connects me the most to Judaism."

He said he will keep in touch with his new friends on e-mail once he returns to Vancouver. The fact that he speaks Hebrew, he said, helped him interact with the Israeli contingent, consisting of 45 students.

During the ceremony in the President's House, the students sat with their country. Although Barzilai sat beside the huge U.S. group, he was not intimidated. "It feels good to be the only Canadian," he said proudly.

Haggai Kurtz, 13, of Petach Tikva, Gili Shterzer, 15, of Hadera, Prielle Yifrach, 14, of Sderot, and Yoram Haddad, 16 of Paris won the afternoon contest, to become the international champions of the competition.

Reuma Weizman addressed the students at the ceremony. "This is a very important gathering. It shows care and concern of your identity," she told the students. "I want you all to come and study and live here and help us be a strong nation."

South African Jews face fear as well as hope after election

By SUZANNE BELLING
Jewish Telegraphhic Agency

JOHANNESBURG — The first democratic elections in South Africa, in April 1994, brought about a black-led government and a peaceful revolution. People voted with their hearts – or fears.

Last week's elections were different. People voted with their heads.

This was an election about future government and governance, rather than the heady emotion of transformation.

But the attitudes of Jewish voters are split: Some welcome the huge changes during the past five years, while others find that the problems outweigh the benefits.

The first group points to the peaceful revolution that has totally confounded the prophets of doom.

"If we think back five or six years, we would have branded anyone who said that in 1999 crime and corruption would be our major problems, an unrealistic optimist," said a prominent member of the Jewish community. "But there has been no bloody revolution, no armed racial conflict. In fact, there has been a truly astounding degree of reconciliation."

Others focus more on the threat posed by a violent crime rate that reaches into virtually every corner of society, including the Jewish community.

A significant number of Jews have emigrated and others are seriously considering doing so – mainly to the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada and Australia, further depleting the 94,000 Jews who were estimated to live in the country in 1996.

But there was no renewed wave of emigration preceding the elections. Most adopted a wait-and-see attitude regarding the African National Congress (ANC) government under Thabo Mbeki, who was expected to win the elections overwhelmingly.

As of last Thursday, with 85 percent of the vote counted, the ANC had won 65.7 percent of the vote. Mbeki is expected to be inaugurated as president on June 16.

Outgoing President Nelson Mandela astounded whites with his attitude of total forgiveness of past sins during the apartheid regime, but Jews fear Mbeki's approach will not be as reconciliatory.

Russell Gaddin, chair of the Gauteng Council of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies, the country's Jewish umbrella organization, said Jews are nervous and uncertain about Mbeki because they don't know enough about him.

"When I met him, I was struck by his strength. He is a born leader. We need to understand, that over the last five years, the government has undergone a tremendous learning curve. They have now got their priorities in line, and I am confident they will be able to deal with crime and the economy," he said.

Another priority of the new government may be improved relations with Israel.

With the South African elections following soon after Ehud Barak's victory in the Israeli elections, Abe Abrahamson, honorary life president of the South African Zionist Federation, said the "Israel scenario has positive implications for relations between the two countries.

"The situation is now entirely different from what it was some weeks ago. I have confidence in the new Israeli prime minister to get the coalition for peace going."

Relations between Israel and this country have been somewhat strained in post-apartheid South Africa because of the ANC's strong ties with the Palestinians and Libya.

"The South African government is not anti-Israel, but feels that the Palestinians have to have their needs, as they understand them, met," said Rabbi Norman Bernhard of Johannesburg's Oxford Synagogue.

The Democratic party, which appears to have been the most popular party with white English-speaking and Jewish citizens in this election, will replace the New National party as the official opposition. As of last Thursday, the party had received 10 percent of the vote, running second behind the ANC.

'A complete red herring'

Even before election results were in, it was clear that the Democratic party's Jewish leader, Tony Leon, will continue to lead it on a national basis, while his brother Peter, will maintain leadership of the party on a provincial level.

It also appeared that the ANC would achieve a two-thirds majority in the National Assembly. Many white voters are fearful that this will allow the ANC to alter fundamental aspects of the constitution that protect minorities.

Peter Leon shares their concern. He further believes that if the constitution is altered, some professionals, including many Jews, would emigrate.

But, he added, "Other than Islamic fundamentalism in the Western Cape, there is more tolerance towards the Jewish community today than there was in the past."

ANC Parliament member Andrew Feinstein, who is likely to retain his seat, said the concern about the constitution was "a complete red herring.

"People forget the ANC is not just a majority, but by far the most representative party in the country. All minorities are represented in it, and there is therefore no reason why the rights of minorities should not continue," he said.

Dina Saffer, national chair of the South African Union of Jewish Students, said the greatest concern of students is the ANC's affirmative action policy, which limits post-university employment opportunities for whites.

"It is seen as discrimination," she said. "Students generally talk about 'when' they are going, not 'if.' Though there are opportunities, here the vision of students is colored by affirmative action. They can't see through – or past – it."

Debbie Gordon, a 23-year-old medical student, believes the ANC government has been guilty of "reverse apartheid" by limiting university admissions and job placements for whites. She is also concerned about health-care facilities and a lowering of standards.

"The ANC government is dealing with problems symptomatically, rather than treating the cause. They keep bringing up the past, rather than concentrating on the problems of today. The Truth and Reconciliation Commission was established to deal with those."

She believes there is no future for young people in South Africa, "especially considering that two students were held up at gunpoint in their cars during peak-hour traffic recently, under the eyes of a traffic cop a few yards away.

"They should enforce law and order and bring back the death penalty," she said.

Helen Heldenmuth, a producer of religious programs for television, was more optimistic.

"These elections were an incredible experience – so little violence, with voters showing respect and orderliness.

"I have every confidence in Mbeki. He represents the strong upper class blacks emerging in this country. The crime was always horrific in the black townships, but whites are only noticing it more because it has spilled over into their areas and because there is no press censorship."

She chastised pessimistic members of the Jewish community. "They lived in luxury long enough. It is now time for them to take part in the country and in building the nation," she said.

In an election message to the Jewish community, Mbeki referred to the Jewish contribution to the country in all spheres of life – business, the professions, the arts, science, culture, education, sports, medicine and politics.

"The community's positive outlook and efforts towards nation-building, are indeed appreciated. Its contribution, as a minority community, far exceeds its numbers," Mbeki said.

"We hope that your efforts in outreach and development will continue even more in the future as we embark, together with all citizens of South Africa, still further along the democratic road of peace and prosperity."

Marking the millennium

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Britain's official millennium celebrations should be marked with Christian prayers, according to the nation's chief rabbi.

Citing the religious nature of the millennium, Rabbi Jonathan Sacks said that it is, by definition, a Christian celebration.

"It is not and cannot be a Jewish moment or a Muslim moment," he said. "But neither can it be a secular moment, a party celebrating nothing in particular but the passing of time."

Rabbi Sacks made his comments when he delivered the first City Lecture, an event sponsored by the lord mayor of London and the dean of St. Paul's Cathedral.

"As a Jew, I want to live in a country that takes faith seriously," Rabbi Sacks said. "Someone who takes their own faith seriously is more likely to respect my faith, than someone for whom all faith is superstition and all religion an irrelevance.

"It is quite wrong to argue that an inclusive society is one in which religion is absent from our public celebrations. An inclusive society is one in which our many faiths are valued, each in its own way and time.

"The millennium is a Christian time, in a country where Christianity has not merely shaped our common culture and morality," he added. "It has helped those of us who are not Christians feel that our faith has a voice in the conversation, a part to play in the building of society.

"That is why I would feel diminished if the millennium were not a time of Christian prayer and celebration."

Lithuanian government slammed

TORONTO — The Lithuanian government has come under fire for failing to act against Nazi collaborators who have found refuge in the country after been thrown out of the United States.

Efraim Zuroff, director of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre's Israel office, said the Lithuanian government has ignored the presence of eight war criminals, and has turned the country into "the biggest Nazi haven in Europe.

"Such crimes cannot be ignored, nor can their perpetrators be allowed to escape punishment simply because they have eluded justice to date," Zuroff said in a letter to Lithuanian President Valdas Adamkus.

It has become "increasingly clear that Lithuania has become one of the leading havens for Nazi collaborators seeking to escape justice," he said. "Instead of immediately arresting these criminals who were part of the mechanism that implemented the annihilation of Lithuanian Jewry, they are the beneficiaries of the benign neglect of the Lithuanian police and judiciary who prefer to allow them to enjoy their golden years in the secure knowledge they will never have to pay for their crimes."

Nazi collaborators presence ignored

The most recent war criminal to find a home in Lithuania is Aloyzas Balsys, who left the United States in late May rather than answer questions about his role in the Lithuanian Auxiliary Police (Saugumas).

Wartime documents showed Balsys served in the Saugumas as chief of a precinct office in Vilnius from the beginning of November 1941 until at least 1943.

The Vilnius Saugumas arrested Jews caught outside the city ghetto or attempting to escape the ghetto, and turned them over to Nazi authorities. Most were shot at Paneriai, a wooded area near Vilnius. Nearly 55,000 of Vilnius' 60,000 Jews were killed at Paneriai. Many of Vilnius' Jews were killed while Balsys held office.

Other Saugumas members to abandon their U.S. residency rather than face deportation hearings, or who were ordered removed by a court include:

- Adolph Milius, who aided in the persecution of Jews;
- Aleksandras Lileikis, former chief of the Vilnius Saugumas;
- Kazys Gimzaukskas, Lileikis' deputy;
- Kazy Ciurinskas, a member of the 2nd Lithuanian Auxiliary Police Battalion, which participated in the murder of tens of thousands of Lithuanian and Belarus Jews;
- Vincas Valkavickas, an armed guard during the massacre of more than 3,700 Jews near Svencionys, Lithuania.

CJN Rosh Hashanah Photo Contest

The CJN announces its fifth annual Rosh Hashanah photo contest. We are asking readers to submit their own original photographs either of Israel or on any Jewish theme in their community.

Anyone can enter except CJN employees or members of their families.

A maximum of three photos per entrant may be submitted. Please write your name, address and phone number on the back of each photo. We can only return the photos if you provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

You may mail or deliver your photos to: The CJN Rosh Hashanah Contest, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, Aug. 16, 1999.

The judges will choose three photographs which, in their opinion, are the most expressive and evocative. These three photos will be published in The CJN Rosh Hashanah issue, Sept. 17, 1998. Each of the "winning" photographers will receive a cheque for $100.

We will undoubtedly receive many worthy submissions. But only three will be selected as the "winners." The decisions of the judges will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

Winning entrants will be notified by telephone before Shabbat on Aug. 27, 1999.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Artists fuse details from past

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Badanna Zack's The Pool Room and Leya Evelyn's paintings, Familiar Shadows, are in sharp contrast, yet each explores and fuses details from the past.

These works are appearing at the Justina M. Barnicke Gallery in Hart House, at the University of Toronto until June 17.

Zack does not shoot pool but her regulation 4 ft x 8 ft pool table, a composite of wooden forms, laminated papier mâché and corrugated cardboard, appears authentic. Billiard balls and cues and rack are all faux creations. The pool table is centred under a hanging fixture and the light is subdued to produce a ghost-like quality.

The sculptor weaves a kind of magic as she transports viewers to past games and induces them to remember the players.

Her work, Homage To My Grandfather, which is not at the gallery, is a reflection of Zack's grandfather, a tailor who came to Canada from Russia in the early 1900s.

It features a series of sewing machines in a factory setting. The machines are shown in progressive stages of deterioration right down to total disintegration, revealing the passage of time. Recurring waves of immigration are symbolized, when men and women, like Zack's grandfather, faced hardship and exploitation.

The Pool Room by Badanna Zack.

Leya Evelyn grew up in Bethesda, Md. at a time when hers was the only Jewish family in the neighborhood. Her father was employed by the United States government in Washington.

She now has her home on a lake in Hubeley, N. S., outside Halifax.

Her works, mainly oils and collage on canvas, probe family and childhood environments. Combining the abstract with the representational, she overlays photographic images from family albums with broad sweeps of bold color. The onlooker can venture into the picture and go beyond the artist's personal search to discover his or her particular response.

In Nim No. 1, she portrays an imaginary place which beckons with glowing yellows and apricots yet deepens in one sector to a forbidding black.

An ambitious 32-piece assemblage of 20-inch square paintings, primarily strong blues but with numerous subtle variations, embraces wide ranging thoughts and feelings.

Unlike her more vivid works, Evelyn's Barefoot No. 21, 22 and 23 are photo collages with delineations in pen and pencil, evoking gentler memories.

The Justina M. Barnicke Gallery hours are Monday to Friday, 11 a.m. - 7 p.m., Saturday and Sunday, 1 p.m. - 4 p.m. 978-8398.

Cantorial concert a special treat

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — My husband is known for his serious demeanor and dignified behavior.

Yet there he was at the Shaarei Shomayim Second Annual Cantorial Concert: Yaakov Motzen and Friends, enthusiastically singing along with the performers.

Not that he was the only one by any means. The nearly sold out concert was well received and obviously enjoyed by everyone.

The performers were Yaakov Motzen, chazzan of Shaarei Shomayim; Shlomo Simcha Sufrin, the synagogue's assistant cantor, who is increasingly well known, under the name Shlomo Simcha, as a singer of popular Jewish religious music; and Israel Rand, chazzan of the Hampton Synagogue in Westhampton Beach, N.Y.

Also appearing was the Shaarei Shomayim Men's Choir, under the direction of David Young.

While one might have wished for a lighter hand in selecting the music, nevertheless cantorial selections came from such traditional composers of liturgical music as Yossele Rosenblatt and Moshe Ganchoff, as well as from today's Mordechai Ben David and Abe Rotenberg.

Rand even offered the Yiddish tear-jerker My Yiddishe Mama, not something one might expect from an Israeli-born cantor.

Throughout, Rand displayed a seemingly effortless range and control of voice, especially in his Hatei, from Tachanun, and a lovely version of Santa Lucia.

Sufrin used his solos to highlight his familiarity with the modern works: Shlomo Carlebach's Ki Va Moed, Ben David's Rachem B'Chasdecha, a Shabbat song, and a throat-catching B'shem HaShem from the bedtime Shema, written by Abe Rotenberg.

Motzen lived up to his reputation as one of the best chazzanim in North America, his rich voice adding emotion and color to Samuel Malavsky's Kevodo Maleh Olam and Rosenblatt's Ad Heina.

A highlight of the concert was his Bring Him Home from Les Misérables, which he dedicated to soldiers.

The duets and trios, many performed with the choir, were particularly effective, with the three voices playing off and complementing each other.

An added treat was a viola and guitar accompaniment, by choir members Alan Pollard and Alan Cohen respectively, to the Shabbat song Yedid Nefesh.

The skill of well-known accompanist Daniel Gildar enhanced a memorable concert.

AUCTION OF IMPORTANT HEBREW MANUSCRIPTS

The trustees of London's United Synagogue have turned over a collection of some 140 historic Hebrew manuscripts, once owned by the London Beth Din, to Christie's auction house, which intends to sell them June 23 in New York.

One of the rarest and most valuable items in the collection is a siddur in the Ashkenazi style.

The book was printed on vellum in Prague in 1515, and decorated throughout in the Central European Renaissance style of manuscript illumination. Christie officials estimate that it may fetch between $300,000 to $500,000 (US).

Another highlight is Sefer Sinai, by Abraham Ben Baruch of Rothenburg (d. 1298), a halachic work with an estimated value of $100,000 to $150,000. The collection includes many other medieval and Renaissance manuscripts, including works by Isaac Alfasi, Mordecai Ben Hillel and Isaac Luria and his disciples.

The upcoming sale is the latest in a series of offerings of major Hebraica collections in recent years, including the Shane and Sassoon collections. 212-636-2680.

Children's Book: Toronto author Cary Fagan has revisited Russian author Nikolai Gogol's well-known short story The Overcoat, about a man whose winter coat is stolen. Fagan has given the story a much more satisfying ending. The result is Gogol's Coat, a lavishly illustrated children's book published recently by Tunda Books (a division of McLelland & Stewart).

The story, along with Regolo Ricci's evocative oil-painted illustrations, is first-rate and certain to entice children. In bookstores everywhere.

In the Spotlight: The Travellers, the celebrated Canadian folk group, blazed a path of glory in the late 1950s and early 1960s, recording numerous albums and even performing for the Queen. Not bad for a bunch of guys (and one "gal") from Toronto's downtown working-class Jewish neighborhood.

You've certainly heard their Canadianized version of Woody Guthrie's immortal tune This Land Is Your Land, and you've probably heard their renditions of great songs by Bob Dylan, Ian Tyson and that most prolific composer known as "Traditional."

Sony Music Canada has just released This Land Is Your Land, a CD by The Travellers featuring their best works between 1960 and 1966. The CD's extensive liner notes explains that the group members came out of the Yiddish-speaking, left-leaning milieu in Toronto's Spadina neighborhood of the 1940s and 1950s.

Their families belonged to the Labor League, which later became the United Jewish People's Order (UJPO). They were also associated with Camp Naivelt, the UJPO summer camp north of Toronto, and the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir.

Emulating Pete Seeger's group The Weavers, several Camp Naivelt veterans brought some musical relief to picketing workers at GM and Ford plants in Oshawa and Windsor as early as 1940. That was the beginning of the protean group that eventually became The Travellers.

They played their first gig in September 1953, and got their first big break in 1955 when they made the first of a series of appearances on CBC's Pick the Stars.

The "original" Travellers (ca. 1957) were Sid Dolgay, Jerry Gray, Jerry Goodis and Simone Johnston, but the personnel kept shifting. Goodis, for example, eventually opened a successful advertising agency, which necessitated his retirement from the band.

Gray performed a Yiddish show last winter, and may perform a similar show at the upcoming Ashkenaz festival. If you love folk music, you'll enjoy hearing The Travellers' new CD, available in record stores everywhere.

Novelist's new release a coming-of-age story

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — "I'm not happy unless I'm living inside a novel," confesses Toronto author Cary Fagan, sipping a cappuccino in the Second Cup near his Forest Hill office.

Happily, Fagan is presently immersed in the creation of a fifth novel, which he began the day after completing the final draft of his latest novel, Felix Roth, recently published by Stoddart ($21.95). Not surprisingly, he began Felix Roth the day after finishing a previous work, Sleeping Weather.

"I'm not a procrastinator," he says. "I like to get the work done. Having children – he and his wife have a 7-year-old and a 2-year-old – "really helped me to focus. I really don't have a lot of time to stare out the window and think profound or poetic thoughts. I spend my work time writing. I just hope the profundity makes it into my writing, somehow."

Felix Roth has already won modest critical acclaim in Canada. Stoddart is reportedly optimistic about selling American and world rights to the book, whose appeal is immeasurably enhanced because the legendary Yiddish writer Isaac Bashevis Singer is an important presence in it.

Felix Roth takes place in New York in the 1970s. Brothers Felix and Aaron Roth, who grew up in suburban Toronto and are now in their early-to-mid 20s, accompany each other on a week-long visit to Manhattan.

Aaron, who has become Orthodox, makes the journey in order to meet the Kovner Rebbe in Brooklyn. Felix, meanwhile, is an aspiring writer who hopes to present a short story to the elderly Singer, one of his literary idols.

While Singer is not a walking and talking character in the book, he is a much-discussed figure, a literary legend who haunts the Belnorde Apartments in the upper-80s of Manhattan.

Fagan, whose previous books have used settings in Toronto and Europe, refers to Felix Roth as "my New York novel," and calls it a Bildungsroman, a term used to describe the story of a young man's coming-of-age.

"When I was in my late teens and early 20s, I loved novels like this – Portrait of the Artist As A Young Man, and Great Expectations, which was the first novel I fell in love with. These are novels that show a young man struggling into adulthood."

In pure Singer-like style, Felix Roth shows a young man balancing relations between two women, one of whom is married. It is also more purely a book about literature than Fagan's previous works, and it resonates with literary discussions, not only of Singer, but also of the accomplished troika of Jewish writers named Roth — Joseph, Henry and Phillip — of whom Fagan considers the Czech-born Joseph, who is perhaps the most obscure, to be the finest.

"Is there room for a fourth Roth? That's the question Felix asks himself. To some degree, it's a question we all ask ourselves: is there room for us to make our mark? In that sense, the book grapples with contemporary questions of identity."

One of a handful of promising and relatively young Canadian Jewish writers, Fagan asserts that Jewish writers collectively tend to spend too much time gazing into the rear-view mirror.

"I would like to see Canadian Jewish artists grappling with contemporary issues," he says. "It's so tempting to return to what we think of as a richer history – Europe before the war, and the natural dramatic possibilities of the Holocaust. I think we're right to draw on that history. But for Jewish writing to continue to be relevant, we need to go forward and find our themes in the contemporary life around us."

But even as he looks forward, Fagan is also looking backward into his own past. Whereas Sleeping Weather was about people in their 30s, Felix Roth focuses on a man in his early 20s, and Fagan's current work-in-progress focuses on a character in his teen years.

Recipient of numerous awards, the Toronto-born author says he found the production of his first novel (The Animals' Waltz, published 1994) so taxing that he almost gave up his ambition to write. At 41, however, he acknowledges that the work has become much easier, and says he has hit his stride.

"I do feel like I have a calling, and whatever the value of my work or however modest my talent, I can't help but feel that writing is what I was born to do," he says.

"I get a feeling from writing that I don't get from anything else. I suppose some people get it from downhill skiing, but I get it from writing."

Cantors sing pop, opera

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

HAMILTON — Three young cantors took the stage recently at Beth Jacob Congregation in Hamilton for a night of Jewish and popular song.

Cantor Ben Silverberg of Beth Jacob, Cantor Marshall Loomer of Adath Sholom in Toronto and Cantor Noam Goodman delighted the packed synagogue with Jewish favorites and classical songs.

Silverberg, 24, the youngest full-time cantor in Canada, enthusiastically opened the concert with Shalom Chaverim. He then encouraged audience participation during his rendition of Sim Shalom.

Loomer, 38, dedicated Eilu D'varim to his father, who introduced his son to chazzanut when he was 8 years old.

Loomer and Silverberg, friends outside of the professional setting, had arms around each other's shoulders during their sweeping, waltz-like duet, Areshet Sefateinu.

When Goodman joined Loomer for their joyful version of Od'cha, it seemed as if their voices had blended into one.

Goodman, 29, is the High Holy Day Cantor at Lake Shore Drive Synagogue in Chicago and a full-time lawyer at the firm of Fogler, Rubinoff. He offered a tribute to the traditional cantors of the past with his sensitive rendition of Der Alter Chazzen. It touchingly told the story of an aging cantor asking God to preserve his voice and not to cast his soul away.

The second half of the fundraising concert for Beth Jacob featured classical, operatic and show tunes.

Silverberg sang the aria Bella Sicome un Angelo by Donizetti with crisp Italian diction, and his touching Beautiful Dreamer by Stephen Foster entranced the audience.

Loomer's delivery of Danny Boy, the traditional Irish air, and Bring Him Home from Les Misérables highlighted his delivery of popular songs.

Goodman sang La Mattinata and O Sole Mio. The evening concluded with a harmonizing trio of Zol Shoin Kumen di Geulah, but the crowd demanded more. The encore, B'Shuv HaShem, flowed joyously into Am Yisrael Chai.

MC Marvin Rosenshein joked with the cantors and the audience between songs. Piano accompanists Leon Karan and Nathan Rosen added the perfect touch of musical sensitivity.

Rembrandt and Van Gogh: A major exhibition of Rembrandt self-portraits and other works by the Dutch master opens Sept. 25 in Mauritshuis Museum, The Hague, Netherlands, and runs until Jan. 9, 2000.

Rembrandt painted a total of 45 self-portraits, at least 25 of which are in the show, along with 20 Rembrandt etchings and drawings.

One of the themes of the exhibition is the questionable authenticity of works that may have been wrongly attributed to the artist. A second theme is the art of self-portraiture, and the show also includes several self-portraits created by Rembrandt's pupils.

Rembrandt was intrigued by Jews and the Dutch Jewish community, but apparently none of his paintings on Jewish subjects is included. Mauritshuis Museum, phone 011-31-70-302-3435, Web site is www.mauritshuis.nl.

Here's some more good news for art lovers intending to visit Holland: Amsterdam's famed Van Gogh Museum, which has been closed for renovations for nearly 10 months, opens its doors again on June 24. The building has been modernized and now features a new wing, to be used for temporary exhibitions. Van Gogh Museum, 011-31-20-570-5291. Web site, vangoghmuseum.nl.

Guide to Jewish Europe: The Jewish Welcome Service of Vienna, a government-sponsored agency, has for years offered to the public a succinct and colorful guide on Jewish Heritage in Central Europe.

The 36-page pamphlet focuses on sites in Austria as well as in Poland, Hungary, the Czech Republic, Italy and, optimistically, the former Yugoslavia. It's available free of charge from the Austrian National Tourist Office, 2 Bloor St. E., Suite 3330, Toronto M4W 1A8. 967-3381.

The tourist office also has a limited number of copies of a smaller booklet on Jewish Vienna.

More News from Holland: As of May 1, the Resistance Museum in Amsterdam has moved to a new location: Plantage Kerklaan 61a in the Plancius Building. Its new permanent collection displays a chronological overview of the years 1930 to 1950. Many authentic objects, as well as street scenes, documents, photos, and video and sound excerpts tell the visitor about the occupation and the resistance movement in Holland.

Friends collaborate on book that's Abundantly Simple

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Helen Kafka and Laura Hellen travelled through Europe after high school almost two decades ago, Hellen was the main French-language communicator – but in Switzerland they relied on Kafka's fluent Yiddish, acquired in part at Workmen's Circle Sunday School.

One day, in a Swiss cheese shop, the proprietor asked Kafka, "Where are you from? The north?"

The story still makes the two friends laugh.

In fact, almost anything can set them off. Their recent book, Abundantly Simple, Everywoman's Gratitude Journal – a spoof of the popular gratitude journal Simple Abundance – is the result of their appreciation of life's absurdities.

Kafka, a television producer whose credits include Street Legal, and Hellen, a dental clinic manager and calligrapher (she illustrated the book), were both very taken with a comment made by actress Gwyneth Paltrow to Oprah Winfrey on the latter's popular television talk show, regarding Simple Abundance.

As they recall, Winfrey expressed gratitude for two squirrels playing in a tree and Paltrow said, "Oprah, I think you're pushing it."

The book, dedicated to Paltrow, began as a case of verbal one-upmanship. Kafka and Hellen decided to preserve their bons mots on index cards, thinking they were too funny not to write down.

Abundantly Simple (Insomniac Press, $14.99) plays subtle homage (Hellen's word, pronounced the French way) to the two friends' past, with some dates chosen for personal significance and at least one allusion to the authors' alma mater, William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute.

There is little "homage" to Canada, though, with a single one-page "journal entry" supposedly originating in this country. "I'm grateful that the igloo has central air," is one of the lines.

There probably are people who will take the stereotypes seriously, admitted Hellen, an English teacher by training, in an interview. "But we can laugh at that. Canadians have a great sense of humor about themselves and this point of view."

The heavy American emphasis is partly due to the U.S. origin of the self-help phenomenon, said Kafka, who spends part of her time in Los Angeles.

"It just sort of evolved this way," said Hellen.

The book is currently available only in Canada, but is expected to be released in the United States in late summer or early fall.

Are any of the entries in the book based on their own experiences? "Oh my God, many!" exclaimed Kafka. Hellen offered a demure, "No comment."

The book has a touch of Jewish content, seen in datelines like www.oursimcha@temple.com, and Camp Taka-Amahya.

Hellen credits her late maternal grandfather, Sam Weinstock, for her sense of humor. "If someone had a fly in their food, he would say, 'It's okay, it's fleishik,' " she recalls.

But the co-authors' inspiration comes from "everywhere," they said. "We got a lot of ideas from [CNN interviewer] Larry King. He would say specific places, and we would say, 'That sounds funny.' "

On a more serious note, Hellen, a divorced mom of two, said she is inspired by her daughters.

Despite divergent life and career paths, the friendship between Hellen and Kafka, who is unmarried, has been a constant. They've known each other since Grade 10, and became friends on their trip to Europe. Now they joke about their upcoming 40th birthdays.

"We have the same kind of humor," said Kafka, "but she's very refined, and I'm borderline tasteless."

"We balance each other out," said Hellen.

Jewish Healing Project stresses faith's importance

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Nosson Westreich has seen for himself the power of faith in healing.

The rabbi, now a senior resident in psychiatry at Sunnybrook Health Science Centre, told the story of a patient he saw as a medical student, as part of his keynote address at a recent program of the Toronto Jewish Healing Project.

Speaking at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue on Finding Hope: The Search for Faith Against Adversity, Rabbi Westreich related the story of a woman with end-stage ovarian cancer and an abdominal blockage.

It was his duty to tell her that death was imminent and would be painful. Instead, he entered her hospital room, asked her how she was doing, and nodded silently as she spoke to him.

"I know I'm not well," he recalled her saying. "I know I have faith. I have friends who are going to come by later – people I trust – and they're going to put their hands on my stomach and I'm going to be okay."

Rabbi Westreich didn't say a word. "I [then] called this woman once a month for nine months," he told the audience.

The four-year-old healing project, which is not affiliated with any denomination of Judaism, uses sacred texts, rabbinic commentary, music, ritual and stories as a healing adjunct. Projects in the works include monthly healing services and a workshop for professionals in the helping services.

It is one of over a dozen Jewish healing projects to have sprung up in North America in recent years.

"The [Jewish] mandate, 'Do not separate yourself from the community,' is never more important than at a time of illness," said Etta Ginsberg McEwan, co-ordinator of the project.

In another case, a hospital patient who'd been burned in a fire, discovered that her daughter, who was more seriously injured, had died. Even though the mother was "physically stable," she closed her eyes and died on hearing the news. "Her hope, her faith was taken away," the rabbi said.

"Faith can make the difference between life and death, between integrity and despair [or] isolation."

"When we talk about hope and faith from a Jewish perspective, we cannot forget about God," he said.

But everyone has questions, he noted.

Of several philosophical and inspirational stories he told, probably that of Rabbi Akiva illustrates the issue of faith and its challenges best, Rabbi Westreich said.

A shepherd who disdained people of faith until he had a revelation at age 40, Rabbi Akiva maintained his strong belief even when tortured by the Romans for teaching his students, Rabbi Westreich explained.

"Faith is a life's journey... It is a process." The lesson of Rabbi Akiva is that "it's never too late."

Rabbi Joseph Kelman, rabbi emeritus of Beth Emeth, said he thinks it's wrong for physicians – "who represent authority" – to say there is no hope.

Ultimately everyone encounters adversity, said Rabbi Ronald Weiss, who is director of chaplaincy for the Toronto Jewish community, a member of the Toronto Jewish Healing Project's volunteer committee, and co-editor with Rabbi Kelman of the booklet The Path of Healing: Prayers for Comfort, Inspiration and Hope, a publication of the Association of Jewish Chaplains of Ontario and Jewish Family & Child Service's Chaplaincy Services.

"One of the things we do have control over is our reaction," said Rabbi Weiss. "Often, finding hope means learning how to cope.

"Some people lose their faith and believe the world is misgoverned," he said. "We tend to believe good people should have easy lives."

North York General launches Web site

TORONTO — North York General Hospital now has a home on the Internet with the launch of its Web site.

"The web site will give our community an easier way to find out general information about the hospital and our services," says Web site co-ordinator Debra Bloomfield. "We're planning a site that our community members will find is worth bookmarking and visiting frequently."

Among the facts that can be found on the Web site are: updates on restructuring and changes at the hospital's three sites, descriptions of patient care services, health education and fundraising events, e-mail links to selected departments and visiting hours and parking rates for all sites.

Jewish General Hospital joins major study on breast cancer

MONTREAL — The Jewish General Hospital (JGH) is among more than 400 health centres in the United States, Canada and Puerto Rico taking part in one of the largest breast cancer prevention studies ever. The JGH is now recruiting volunteers for the study of the drugs tamoxifen and raloxifene.

"We are excited about bringing this important study to the Montreal area," said principal investigator Dr. Richard Margolese.

The trial will include 22,000 post-menopausal women at increased risk of breast cancer to determine whether the osteoporosis prevention drug raloxifene (Evista) is as effective in reducing the chance of developing breast cancer as tamoxifen (Nolvadex) has proven to be.

The JGH is part of the National Surgical Adjuvant Breast and Bowel Project (NSABP), the network of research professionals that will conduct STAR, as the study is known, which is supported by the National Cancer Institute.

"Studies of raloxifene suggest it has the potential to prevent breast cancer. The only way to prove that potential is to do a clinical trial in which the risks and benefits of raloxifene are directly compared with the risks and benefits of tamoxifen," he said.

An important part of STAR will be to compare the long-term safety of the two drugs.

Tamoxifen was shown to reduce the chance of developing breast cancer by about half, in a trial of over 13,000 premenopausal and post-menopausal women at high risk of breast cancer, according to results announced a year ago and published in the Journal of the National Cancer Institute last September. The U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) approved the use of tamoxifen to reduce the incidence of breast cancer in women at high risk, last October.

Half took tamoxifen, half took placebo

In that study, half the women took tamoxifen and half took a placebo.

However, the drug increases the women's chances of developing four potentially life-threatening health problems: endometrial cancer (the lining of the uterus), blood clots in large veins, blood clots in the lungs, and possibly stroke.

STAR is an attempt to find other options with a minimum of side effects.

Researchers say information about the safety of raloxifene is limited compared to the data available on tamoxifen. The drug was approved in December 1997 by the FDA to prevent osteoporosis, and has been in clinical trials for about five years.

Women taking the drug in studies of osteoporosis have had an increased incidence of forming blood clots, similar to the risk seen with tamoxifen. However, in these studies, raloxifene did not increase the risk of endometrial cancer.

For STAR, the JGH is looking for women who are postmenopausal, at least 35 years old, and have an increased risk of breast cancer as determined by their age, family history, personal medical history, age at first menstrual period and the age they were when their first child was born.

They will go through a process known as informed consent, during which they will learn about the potential benefits and risks of tamoxifen and raloxifene before deciding whether to participate in STAR.

Once a woman chooses to participate, she will be randomly assigned to receive either 20 mg of tamoxifen or 60 mg of raloxifene daily for five years and will have regular follow-up examinations.

The maker of tamoxifen, Zeneca Pharmaceuticals of Wilmington, Del., and the maker of raloxifene, Eli Lilly and Co., of Indianapolis, Ind., are providing their drugs for the trial without charge.

ELI puts focus on child abuse in Israel

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

TORONTO — One organization trying to make a difference for abused Israeli children is ELI, an association for child protection in Israel, now marking its 20th anniversary.

The organization provides assistance for abused children and their adult abusers.

The Canada Israel Association for Child protection ELI, founded in 1994, recently held a fundraising concert at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts featuring children's entertainers, Judy and David.

Of the 400 people in attendance, approximately 250 were clients of local social service and educational agencies. They were treated to the concert by the organizers. Many of them would otherwise not have had the opportunity to attend.

Some of the agencies selected included Zareinu, Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), Earl's Court, Variety Village and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services. Many of the clients of those agencies are victims of child abuse.

ELI's main objective is to raise awareness about the maltreatment of children, says Fran Goldman, founder of the Canadian branch of ELI.

In Israel the organization also provides intense therapy for abused children and their families, shelter and a telephone hotline, an information and resource centre on child protection, as well as educational programs in Israeli schools. Service is available in English, Hebrew and Arabic.

Goldman notes that ELI runs a special program for more closed communities, like new immigrant or haredi families. These groups may not have exposure to social services.

"This (child abuse) crosses all societies," says Goldman.

She told The CJN that a recent survey found that 30,000 to 40,000 Israeli children have been abused physically, verbally, emotionally or neglected by their parents. "It's just the tip of the iceberg."

Established in Tel Aviv by Prof. Hanita Zimirin, ELI offers placement for children removed from their families by the court.

The organization tries to keep families intact, says Goldman. Kids are only removed from their parents when neglect has reached an extreme case, she explains.

A new unit was established recently to provide legal representation for families. For example, Goldman says, if a mother and daughter want to leave an abusive father, then ELI will provide legal representatives.

The hotline won the award for best hotline in Israel in 1999. All the callers remain anonymous, and they deal with professionals, or volunteers who go through a rigorous training process, she says.

ELI is dependent on donations. Goldman says Shoppers Drug Mart was the first large company to give a substantial gift.

ELI also believes in giving to other charities and so a percentage of ticket sales from the recent concert went to JF&CS in Toronto, which also combats child abuse.

Israel can be a very stressful place for children, particularly those of new immigrants, says Goldman. There's a huge number of immigrants, and the assimilation process is often difficult. Sometimes the adults take out their frustrations on their children, she says.

Besides holding a children's concert every year, ELI (Israel) plans to hold a 20th anniversary ceremony at the Israeli president's residence on June 23.

Various sectors of Israeli societies will attend, among them, religious and secular and Arab groups. There will also be representatives from government ministries, youth movements and the school systems.

STUDENTS MARK EARTH DAY

Future opponent for Gary Kasparov

Chess maven is Canada's champ among Grade 1 kids

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Harris Kaufman, chess is both intellectually stimulating and eminently enjoyable.

Of course, at age six, little Harris is unlikely to put it in quite those words. In the colloquial terminology employed by young Harris, chess "is fun" and "I get my brain stronger."

From the sounds of things, Harris is doing pretty good in the "brains" department. Recently, the boy wonder, accompanied by his parents, Allan Kaufman and Vicki Sterling, returned from a weekend tournament in Summerside P.E.I. in which he won top spot in Canada among children in Grade 1.

Harris won nine games out of 10 and avenged an early round loss by winning the championship game versus the number two seed from Quebec.

Harris was only too happy to discuss his victory. Coming out on top is the other element about chess that Harris enjoys. "I like winning," he said without reservation. "That's something I like a lot."

So far in his tender, young career, Harris has been doing a lot of winning. To advance to the national championships, Harris had to win a series of tournaments beginning with one in Agincourt, which is part of greater Toronto. He followed that up with wins in a city tournament and in an Ontario-wide event, giving him the privilege of representing Ontario at the Canadian Chess Challenge in the Grade 1 division.

The Canadian Chess challenge is an 11-year-old tournament operated by the Chess 'n Math Association, a national scholastic chess organization.

Champions from each province from grades 1 through 12 participated in the event.

Justin Lasker of Winnipeg's Gray Academy of Jewish Education finished first in the Grade 2 division, while David Hier of Toronto was fourth. Other Jewish participants included Matthew Herzberg of Toronto (Grade 4), Zev Permack, Gray Academy (Grade 3), Daniel Lipson, Gray Academy (Grade 5) and Danny Goldenberg of Quebec (Grade 12).

Harris, who attends Leo Baeck Day School in Toronto, began playing chess before he turned five. "It was a nice alternative to action figures," said his mom, Vicki, who introduced him to the game. "It's a lot quieter."

Harris took to it immediately. He now plays four games a week, usually against kids a year or two older than himself. He can solve the newspaper chess puzzles, and "I can beat my dad," the youngster boasts.

Harris' natural talent and desire to win are reinforced by studying the game at a chess school operated by the Chess 'n Math Association on Bayview near Eglinton.

The club provides instruction in chess techniques and it organizes regular competitions.

Harris can rattle off various game openings, from Spanish to Italian to King's Gambit to Queen's Gambit. The Two Knights opening is his favorite, he said.

As much as he loves the game, Harris admits "my favorite thing is hockey, even more than chess."

Still, his ambitions lay in chess and they're pretty formidable. "I'd like to play [Gary] Kasparov, the world champion," the chess maven says as he runs off for milk and cookies with a friend.

Maccabi soccer team needs financial help

TORONTO — What good are a few good men, if they're stranded thousands of miles from the action?

To help get his men to the action in Mexico City this summer, the head of Maccabi Canada's soccer squad is inviting financial support from the community.

Canada is sending a top calibre soccer team to the Pan-American Maccabi Games this July, but the team needs to raise $50,000 to be sure all athletes can participate, said soccer head coach Martin Scott of Toronto.

The team is offering sponsors advertising opportunities based on placement of corporate logos on team uniforms, Scott said.

Placement on the front of the game jersey will run $7,500 while a logo on game shorts is available for $2,500. Other uniform placements have prices in between. In addition, the team in inviting tax-deductible donations or a donation of goods and services.

The team Scott has assembled sports an international flavor, with many hailing from across Canada and from outside Canada's borders. Dan Sankar, a former member of the professional Toronto Shooting Stars, is of Indian heritage while Irv Studin, a 1999 Rhodes Scholarship winner and member of the 1998 Toronto Lynx pro team, was born in Italy to Russian parents.

Others on the team are from Israel, Argentina and Latvia. There are even a handful of native-born Canadians.

For more information, Scott may be reached by phone at: 905-771-6465; or by fax at: 905-709-9016.

The Inside Back

Caveat emptor of real estate

It has become more common in the past few years for foreign residents to purchase homes in Israel, either as investments or to serve as a base in this country for future visits and even retirement.

Naturally, buying real estate in Israel, as anywhere, brings with it a host of issues which are important to be aware of. I would like to focus in this column on an issue which arises at the high end of the market, in so-called luxury projects.

Although Israel has lagged behind North America in this area, builders have come to realize that the level of maintenance in luxury condominium buildings is as important to buyers as almost any other factor, and to this end they have been replacing the condominium house committee, made up of representatives of all the owners in the building, with maintenance companies.

In ordinary condominium buildings, the house committee is volunteer, and charges a small monthly fee based on actual expenditures for cleaning the hallways, gardening, heating fuel, etc. Maintenance companies, on the other hand, exist to make a profit, and so charge a fee on top of their expenses.

When purchasing a condominium in a luxury building with a maintenance company, the buyer will generally be required to sign a contract with the company.

A case currently going on in Jerusalem exemplifies the complexity of this seeming-ly simple situation. The dispute revolves around a luxury project involving several towers and townhouses – over 350 condominiums – which are maintained by one company. According to the standard agreements all the owners signed, the company may be replaced, if 75 percent of the owners vote to do so.

A group of residents who were not pleased with the services provided, have petitioned the Jerusalem District Court to declare the contract terminated, and enable them to replace the company with another maintenance body which the tenants will appoint.

Another group of tenants (who, for fairness' sake, I must point out that I represent) also joined the proceedings, arguing that while they would like to see improvements made, they bought their homes in the knowledge that the complex is maintained by a professional, experienced, company, and that if a tenants' association takes over, it will not be able to cope with the myriad of issues involved in maintaining such a large project.

In such a case, they argue, the level of maintenance and repair will fall dramatically, taking with it the value of their homes, and turning the luxury neighborhood into a slum. This group of owners wishes to negotiate with the company for a change in terms, but prefers to avoid what they see as throwing the baby out with the bath water.

One can certainly argue the merits of the case, and my own personal involvement prevents me from discussing it objectively, but it does highlight some of the issues which arise in these situations.

First of all, a professional maintenance company adds to the costs of keeping a home in Israel, and buyers should be aware of the fact that they have very little control and supervision over these costs. One of the issues, which in my opinion is hidden behind the legal arguments in the case mentioned above, is how much the different sides trust the honesty and professionalism of the company's managers.

Secondly, retaining a company, rather than a house committee, should lead to a higher level of cleanliness and professionalism, and may even cut certain costs, as a large company can purchase parts and services in bulk. It also frees tenants from the chores involved. At the same time, a conflict of interest can arise between tenants who can afford the price and prefer the luxury, and those who desire to cut the fees at any cost.

There is a growing body of case law in which the courts weigh in on the side of tenants who require protection from draconian contracts which bind them to an expensive and sometimes undesirable arrangement. This needs to be balanced against the fact that the damage caused by ending the contract should not outweigh the benefits.

In any case, there are very real advantages to this arrangement, together with some risks. Purchasers should get independent advice from a professional who understands the issues and takes the time to explain them fully.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My friends Jerry and Batya have recently split up after a long marriage. They are both wonderful friends to me, and I am close with both of them.

When they first went their separate ways, I managed to stay in touch with both of them quite successfully; however, although their divorce started off amicably, there are more hard feelings now.

I am often asked for my opinion, which I never give, and this often ends in a quarrel as well.

I have noticed that most of their friends have now divided their loyalties either one way or the other, and I don't want to be one of those.

What can I do to keep both these friendships alive?

Split Decision

Dear Split Decision

Ideally, when a couple splits, it would be great to stay close to both parties, but realistically, that is very difficult.

This problem seems to be growing. Wherever you turn, another couple is breaking up. As a friend, it is a difficult thing to accept. When a couple breaks up, it is ultimately their decision, forcing you to change the status of your relationship with them. It is out of your control, and you have to accept their decision, and likely choose the direction your friendship will take.

You are very brave and possibly very idealistic to try to stay close to both of your friends. It certainly is worth a try and worth the effort, but you wouldn't be the first to find that this arrangement isn't practical and doesn't work. At best, you might be able to expect to stay close to one person and become an acquaintance of the other.

I do have to commend you on your wisdom in staying out of their quarrels and keeping your opinions to yourself. Sometimes, friends try to take sides and bad-mouth the ex, only to find out that two months later they have gotten back together and you have said all kinds of terrible things.

Stay strong and keep trying. Anything worth having is worth working for.

UJA Federation Annual Report

Changing Lives.
Every Hour.
Every Day.

UJA FEDERATION

No one gift changes more lives.

Campaign For Fifty Furthers Assistance

The success of UJA Federation's Campaign for Fifty has increased assistance to Jews in need and laid a solid foundation for the future of Toronto's growing Jewish community.

The first year of UJA Federation's bold initiative to raise $50 million annually by 2001 brought in a record-breaking $40.5 million - $4 million more than the year before. Additional funds raised through increased contributions and new donors have already been channeled to support a wide variety of programs to assist the vulnerable, strengthen Jewish identity and rescue Jews from danger around the world.

This year alone, UJA Federation has increased its allocation to Jewish Family and Child Service by over $550,000 – preserving essential programs and service for, among others, abused women and children who witness abuse. More disadvantaged youngsters will benefit from UJA Federation summer camp subsidies locally while increased numbers of children in the former Soviet Union (FSU) will get their first taste of Judaism in Jewish Agency run summer camps. Support has also been extended for the sick and institutionalized through Jewish Chaplaincy visits, students with special needs and children at risk in Israel.

With the help of Campaign for Fifty funding, many more Jews in our community are exploring their Jewish identity. Parents and children are learning together through family education programs, grants have been awarded to diverse organizations sponsoring innovative Jewish programming for the unaffiliated and additional financial assistance has been provided to Israeli initiatives promoting worldwide Jewish unity.

UJA Federation provided an uninterrupted stream of support to Jews threatened by rising anti-Semitism and declining economic conditions in the FSU thanks to increased UJA Federation contributions. About 60,000 FSU Jews are expected to make aliyah this year – 15,000 more than last year. Teenagers who left for Israel without their parents received comprehensive care and counseling to help with the transition. In Albania, UJA Federation's partner organization – the Jewish Agency – transported over 130 tons of relief to Kosovo refugees and financed flights to Israel for both Jews and ethnic Albanians.

A Vision of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow

During the next few months UJA Federation, together with local agencies, schools and individual supporters, is beginning to set the stage for a new era in community development in order to meet the growing needs of Jewish Toronto. During the last 80 years, UJA Federation has succeeded in building and maintaining a strong annual campaign, supporting an extensive and sophisticated network of social, cultural and educational services. Schools, community centres and agencies were built to service young and old, sustaining Jewish values throughout everyday life.

Yet with a population that has tripled over the last 50 years, Jewish Toronto's infrastructure and financial resources are stretched to the limits. The rapid growth of York Region's Jewish population – an estimated 50,000 – and the demand for new and expanded services for our youth, families and the elderly necessitate an immediate coordinated response - Jewish Toronto Tomorrow.

The Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative, spearheaded by UJA Federation, is a long-term plan - a blueprint for the future. Jewish Toronto Tomorrow incorporates new strategies and partnerships, reflecting a new way of thinking collectively about preserving and enhancing all the elements that make our community one of the best in the world. By coordinating the Annual UJA Federation Campaign, centralized capital and endowment fundraising initiatives, UJA Federation and its partners can help make sure all community needs are met.

The new CHAT Anne and Max Tanenbaum Education Centre currently under construction, is one of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow's premier ventures, providing 21 new classrooms and other modern amenities. Other community development projects underway include the renewal of the Bloor Jewish Community Centre and Bathurst Jewish Centre, a Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto and the acquisition of a campus for community services in York Region.

From Joseph Steiner:

As outgoing President of UJA Federation, Joey Steiner has been a tireless hands-on worker over the course of his two-year term. Here are some of his reflections:

Q- What are some of the highlights of your Presidency?

A- We've made real progress on the Legacy Campaign, the establishment of substantial donor-advised endowment funds, and the commitments and renovations to the CHAT building. With the increase in our annual campaign we have the ability to look at new programs or expansion of programs for our agencies. During the crisis in the Israeli Knesset on the conversion issue, the North American federations came together, both individually and collectively, to take a position in support of the rights of all Jews from the various streams. We're focusing on real partnerships with our agencies, and our view of the need for services in York Region.

Q- What do you think is the one most significant accomplishment in the past two years?

A- The whole development of a stronger feeling of common enterprise between UJA Federation and our agencies, and hopefully, increasingly, the synagogues and other institutions.

Joseph Steiner

Q- What do you feel are the largest challenges ahead, not just for UJA Federation, but for the Jewish community of Toronto?

A- I think the biggest one is meeting the needs of the growing Jewish community as it geographically spreads out, bringing services to areas where there are inadequate services now in the north, and downtown. One of the major accomplishments is the plan for the Bloor Jewish Community Centre and the acquisition of a major donor for that. The campus centre for the University of Toronto is another example.

Q- How do you feel personally as your term comes to a close?

A- I have enjoyed it immensely. I love my community work. It's a very important aspect of how I see myself. It's been a great couple of years.

Looking Ahead

From the New President:

As incoming President of UJA Federation, Alan Sandler will continue building bridges to diverse elements of the community and stronger ties to Israel.

"We've made great strides in cultivating new partnerships with our agencies and schools and mapping out common goals. Now it's time to invite more people and organizations to the table," explains Alan Sandler, Past Chair of UJA Federation's Community Planning and Allocations.

High on his list of priorities are families with young children who have little connection with community. "By supporting a wide variety of family education initiatives through various synagogues and institutions, UJA Federation is extending a welcome to families," explains Sandler. "We must make ourselves more available to those seeking a sense of belonging."

"UJA Federation must reach out and let people know we are there for them," he adds. "At the same time, we've asked our agencies and the organizations we work with to open up and share their resources with others."

In addition to increasing support for the vulnerable, including what he calls the "horrific" numbers of Jewish children living in poverty, and continuing overseas rescue efforts, Sandler emphasizes the need to devote greater resources to Israel Experience Programs for students, teachers and adults. "Israel is our richest resource for Jewish education," says Sandler. "I believe that every Jewish teenager should have the opportunity to go to Israel, learn about their heritage and develop lasting relationships with Israelis."

"I've always believed it's the people who make a difference in the end," says Sandler. "By engaging more people in everyday Jewish life, we are guaranteeing the future."

Iran urged to release 13 imprisoned Jews

By JULIA GOLDMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Canada has been asked to help secure the release of 13 Iranian Jews charged by the Iranian government as being spies for Israel and the United States

In the House of Commons last Friday, Thornhill Liberal MP Elinor Caplan requested that Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy investigate, "and add Canada's voice to others around the world demanding the release of these political prisoners."

Caplan noted that the charges carry the death penalty. She said those charged include a number of rabbis and leaders of the Jewish community in Iran.

Canadian Jewish Congress also called on Axworthy to intervene on behalf of the Iranian Jews.

"We ask you to use Canada's influence with the Iranian government and all diplomatic measures to effect their early release," Congress president Moshe Ronen said.

In a letter to Iranian ambassador Dr. Seyed Mohammad Adeli, Ronen called for the immediate release of the 13 Iranian Jews as well as the dropping of all charges. Iran under President Mohammed Khatami had made progress in the area of human rights, the rule of law and development of civil society, Ronen said.

"In our view, the arrests in question will have the effect of jeopardizing the progress made in these areas and casting doubt on Iran's commitment toward the protection of minority rights," he added.

In Ottawa, meanwhile, the Department of Foreign Affairs took steps to inquire into the arrests.

"The department asked our embassy to seek clarification from the Iranian government on the charges of spying," said department spokesperson Michael O'Shaughnessy. "We're following the situation closely and we'll determine our next step after we receive more information."

Meantime, Israel and the United States have strongly condemned the Iranian government for charging the 13 Jews with spying.

Israel called for the immediate release of the detainees, and the United States criticized the arrests, saying, "They are a very disturbing signal."

Iran's state-run radio broadcast a report of the charges last week, according to a report by the Associated Press (AP), quoting the British Broadcasting Company.

The 13 "were accused of spying for the 'Zionist regime' and 'world arrogance,' references to Israel and the United States respectively," the AP report says.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Support Petition's Goals

TORONTO — Individual members of Oraynu, formerly the Secular Jewish Association, probably support the goals of a petition that calls for the removal of references to God in Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms, says Eva Goldfinger, one of Oraynu's leaders. But as a group with charitable status, "we shy away from politics," Goldfinger added. Nevertheless, ridding mentions of God in the Charter and in O Canada are in keeping with secular, humanistic Judaism, she said. The petition was presented to Parliament last week by NDP MP Svend Robinson on behalf of about 1,000 members of the Humanist Association of Canada. The next day, Robinson was demoted to the back benches by party leader Alexa McDonough.

Community Says Farewell

CALGARY — The Jewish community here said goodbye this week to Rabbi Jordan Goldson and his family, who are moving to Israel. Rabbi Goldson was spiritual leader of Temple B'nai Tikvah for 12 years. This Sunday, the community is invited to say farewell to Rabbi Allen Saks, principal of Akivah Academy. Rabbi Saks is headed to a new position in Pennsylvania.

ISRAEL

Olmert Seeks Leadership

JERUSALEM — Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert announced last week that he will run for the Likud leadership when party primaries are held in early September. Olmert drew immediate support from former prime minister Yitzhak Shamir.

Miss World Testifies

TEL AVIV — The 18-year-old Israeli who is the reigning Miss World testified for four hours last week against the man who allegedly raped her last October. Under a law that protects the privacy of rape victims, Linor Abargil's testimony was given behind closed doors. During her testimony, the defendant, the Egyptian-born Israeli Shlomo Noor, complained that he would not receive a fair trial.

Peres On Palestinian State

JERUSALEM — Israel should welcome the creation of a Palestinian state, former Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres said recently. "I say as a politician, there is nothing better for the State of Israel than a free Palestinian state," Peres said. Some Israeli pundits are speculating that Peres will become a cabinet minister in the new government. Others predict he will become UN ambassador or Israel's next president.

WORLD

Art Recovery Plan

BERLIN — A German foundation has cleared the way for Holocaust survivors to recover art that was looted by the Nazis and then hidden behind the Iron Curtain. The Foundation for Prussian Cultural Heritage, which oversees several museums in and around Berlin, voted to give its new president the authority to negotiate returns directly with prewar owners or their heirs.

Book Denies Holocaust

WARSAW — Polish prosecutors charged a history professor last month with writing a book that denies the Holocaust took place. Dangerous Themes by Dariusz Ratajczak violates a Polish law banning the public denial of Nazi and Communist-era crimes, prosecutors said. The book claims that gas chambers at Nazi death camps were used to kill lice on prisoners. If convicted, Ratajczak, who has been suspended from his teaching position, could face up to three years in prison.

Project Head Removed

LOS ANGELES — Director Steven Spielberg's Shoah Foundation recently removed as its president Michael Berenbaum, who joined the group after heading the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum's research institute. Berenbaum was reportedly asked to step down because of fundraising problems and continuing criticism by scholars over the quality of the 50,000 videotaped interviews.

KKK Down Under

SYDNEY — The Ku Klux Klan recently established chapters in Australia for the first time. An Australian newspaper quoted Peter Coleman, the chapters' founder, as saying that "there is a Jew under every rock," and that homosexuals are abnormal.

Coleman was expelled from Australia's extremist One Nation party after party officials learned of his Klan activities.

Rabbi In Bingo Scam

CINCINNATI — A local rabbi who admitted to skimming nearly $1 million from the sale of bingo cards has received three years of probation and was ordered to perform 400 hours of community service. Rabbi Jacob Lustig, 72, who served for more than two decades at Kneseth Israel Congregation, was also ordered to turn over more than $920,000. Sales of the bingo cards brought in more than $1 million in cash during 1996 and 1997, but his congregation received only some $25,000. Rabbi Lustig and three others involved in the case pleaded guilty last month to theft charges.

Former Shul President Elected Mayor

LAS VEGAS — A flamboyant underworld attorney and former synagogue president was elected mayor of Las Vegas by a landslide, according to the final results from this month's vote.

Oscar Goodman, 59, gained fame and considerable wealth representing top mobsters, as well as such celebrities as boxer Mike Tyson.

In an interview, Goodman stressed his past presidency of Temple Beth Shalom, a Conservative congregation, and his support of the Jewish Federation of Las Vegas.

"I'm faulted by some for representing unpopular clients, but I do so in accordance with the Constitution of the United States," he said.

Goodman's candidacy was at first considered a stunt, but his quick wit, candor and pledge to make developers pay to revitalize the city's downtown area propelled him to the top in a field of nine candidates.

The Jewish community in Las Vegas has grown rapidly in recent years, and now numbers 65,000.

Goodman is Las Vegas' second Jewish mayor. Ron Lurie served a decade ago.

The mayor-elect played himself in the Martin Scorsese film Casino and is the subject of a recent British documentary, Mob Law.

SWC helping to fight hate on the Internet

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At the end of March, the Simon Wiesenthal Centre (SWC) finished tabulating the results of a three-year survey of Internet "hate sites." Researchers at the Los Angeles-based organization determined there were 1,426 "problematic" sites worldwide, the vast majority of them located in the United States.

By last week, barely two months later, the total had jumped to 1,833. Less than five years ago, when the Federal Building in Oklahoma City was destroyed by right-wing extremists, there was only one such site, according to Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the SWC.

Since the Oklahoma City bombing, racist groups have flooded the Internet with Web sites, creating "an online subculture that includes the Ku Klux Klan, the World Church of the Creator and the Aryan Nations. They use the Internet to market their product – hate and extremism," Rabbi Cooper said.

Last week, Rabbi Cooper and Sol Littman, the SWC's Canadian representative, presented RCMP, Ontario Provincial Police and Metro Toronto Police officers with copies of a CD-ROM titled Digital Hate 2000. The disc contains the Web addresses of the racist sites and is intended as a research and investigation tool for police. A second version of the CD-ROM is designed as a teaching aid for educators.

The extremist groups that have created these Web sites may be a "lunatic fringe, but they do not lack for sophistication," Rabbi Cooper said. They recognize that the Internet provides them with the opportunity to market their views to young people and to entice them with "hyperlinks" to other sites. "The Internet has become the cement for the skinhead movement. It has created a sense of community and empowerment," he added.

Racist Web sites attract young people by false advertising – one site that purports to be devoted to Martin Luther King Jr., in fact, denigrates the murdered civil rights leader – and through links to more popular sites. Music is a key drawing card. Young people who may not be interested in a Web site that adulates Adolf Hitler can be drawn to such a location by a link from a site that offers free music downloads.

Resistance Records, which sold 50,000 "hate CDs" in 1997 alone, has links to other racist sites, Rabbi Cooper said.

'New battlefield'

"The Internet is not the enemy," he continued, but it has become "the new battlefield of society's struggle against hatred."

When police examined the computer of Eric Harris, one of the teens who shot up Columbine High School, they discovered a three-page memo with instructions on making pipe bombs. The information had been downloaded from an easily accessible Internet site.

"The Internet played a telling role vis a vis Harris and his cohorts in Columbine," Rabbi Cooper said.

Currently, Democratic Sen. Diane Feinstein and Republican Orrin Hatch are pushing for a bill that would make Web sites with bomb-making instructions illegal, he added.

The United States is the source for about three-quarters of the problematic sites worldwide, while Canada has no similar sites at the moment, Rabbi Cooper said.

At one point, there were about 50 hate sites in Canada, Littman said. The SWC was able to get them removed by persuading Internet Service Providers (ISPs) it was in their best interests to refuse to host them.

"We sent letters to the ISPs, saying you don't monitor the sites but we have, and here's some of the stuff on your computers," Littman said.

"We asked them whether they, as businesspeople, want sites they are hosting to promote hate and create discord.

"Quickly, ISPs exercise their prerogatives as businesspeople not to deal with people they felt would be detrimental to their business and contrary to their own consciences," Littman said.

The SWC has also met with the Canadian Association of Internet Providers (CAIP) to urge the industry group to develop a voluntary code of conduct that would see its members exclude racist and pornographic Web sites, Littman added.

In the United States, the SWC has met some resistance from ISP owners who cite free speech guarantees and who reject any "big brother" approach to Internet content. But the SWC has "knocked off a few hundred sites" using that approach, Rabbi Cooper added.

The Internet is not censorable, he continued, but "in the past, the United States and Canada have done a good job of marginalizing racists to the fringes of society. We need to do the same on the Internet."

Tragedy Has Struck

An extraordinary woman in our community—a 50 year old, single mother of 10 children, has tragically passed away after a serious illness.

Her modest salary as a secretary for one of our local Jewish Day Schools, allowed her to barely cover the basic family expenses, let alone the cost of expensive medical treatment and nursing care.

The children have been left with about $200k in debts and no further means of financial support. Funds are required for basic necessities such as food, clothing, housing and Jewish education.

The family desperately wants to stay together, with the older children taking on the responsibility of raising and ultimately marrying off the younger ones and themselves.

We appeal to you to support our community's efforts to establish a trust fund for these children. All cheques over $10 will receive charitable tax receipts. In the spirit of Jewish compassion and generosity at this holiday time, please open your hearts and donate generously. Thank you.

True rear-view light

For most of us, time is usually a window through which we occasionally peer to see things more clearly. But, depending upon who is casting the rear-view light, the angle of perception can distort what we see as easily as it can make our focus sharper.

There is a broad and sinister campaign being waged today by the Palestinian Authority and its supporters, to shine a twisted, deliberately bent light onto the relatively recent history of the Middle East.

It centres around their cynical effort to reintroduce United Nations General Assembly Resolution 181 into the peace process.

As most of us know, that resolution, which was passed in November 1947, purported to resolve Britain's Mandatory Palestine crisis by further partitioning the already partitioned territory into Jewish and Muslim territories.

It also proposed to confer on Jerusalem the status of a corpus separatum, a separate, internationalized entity.

As most of us also know, the local Arab population and all of the surrounding Arab countries, rejected the resolution.

Violent skirmishes and fighting erupted immediately after the vote in what was still Mandatory Palestine.

Then, with the declaration some six months later by the Jewish leadership in Palestine of the creation of an independent Jewish state, the Arabs launched an all-out war of annihilation upon the Jews of the renascent Israel.

But the Jews of renascent Israel refused to be annihilated. They won the war, and they won their state.

The Arabs rejected Resolution 181. Their co-ordinated attack on the Jews of Israel was but the explicit and brutal proof.

With the rejection by the Arabs of Resolution 181 and the resultant urgent need by the Jews to defend themselves, Israel, logically, was no longer bound by the terms of the resolution.

The attempt now by the Arabs to paste back together a document they derisively, violently tore to shreds some 52 years ago, would be laughable but for the ominous sounds of support-like equivocations emanating from some quarters, notably, Europe.

It is imperative, however, that the rear-view light of history shine straight and true. We must not allow the light to bend, or the distortion to go unchallenged.

One of the defining moments of the Six Day War.

If Resolution 181 is allowed somehow to remain "standing," a number of menacing implications arise alongside it.

The PA will argue that if Resolution 181 is Israel's founding legal authority, as it were, any part of present-day territorial Israel which is beyond the territory allocated to the Jewish state in Resolution 181, is occupied territory. They will then argue that this brings upon Israel the application of the Fourth Geneva Convention rules against the occupiers of territories acquired through war.

Moreover, Jerusalem itself – its status legally unresolved in 1947-48 – would, "logically," need to be taken out of Israeli hands and revert to the status of a corpus separatum.

To date, no country other than the United States, not even Canada, has publicly and unequivocally supported Israel's dismissal of this dangerous "181" gambit by the Palestinians.

Having failed to annihilate Israel at its birth, an Arab coalition of governments led by Gamal Nasser tried to do so less than two decades later. This attempt also failed.

Israel's successful defence of its 19-year-old life became known as the Six Day War.

Last week we commemorated the 32nd anniversary of that war.

Lest the revisionists try to bend this historical light as well, I reproduce an excerpt from the announcement on May 22, 1967 by Nasser of Egypt's naval blockade of Israel:

"We awaited the proper day when we would be fully prepared and confident that we would take strong measures if we were to enter the battle with Israel. I say nothing aimlessly... Recently we have felt strong enough that if we were to enter a battle with Israel, with God's help, we could triumph. I said once that we could tell the United Nations Emergency Force (UNEF) to leave within half an hour. Once we were fully prepared we could ask UNEF to leave. That is what has actually happened.

"Taking over Sharm-el-Sheikh means confrontation with Israel. Taking such action means that we are ready to enter war with Israel. It is not a separate operation.

"The battle will be a general one and our basic objective will be to destroy Israel."

It falls to us to help ensure that history and truth will not be separated.

Federal Court finds Kisluk a Nazi collaborator

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A former St. Catharines autoworker who took part in the murder of a Jewish woman in wartime Ukraine, faces loss of citizenship and deportation for lying to immigration authorities about his role as a collaborator with Nazi forces.

Serge Kisluk, 77, volunteered first as a railway guard and then later as a police officer in Makovichi, a small town in the administrative raion (county) of Turiysk, just south of the city of Kovel, Federal Court Judge Allan Lufty found. During his service as an auxiliary policeman, Kisluk accompanied a second armed officer to a wooded area where a 20-year-old Jewish woman was shot. Witnesses interviewed in Ukraine testified the woman had worked in the police headquarters knitting socks for the officers.

Kisluk was also personally involved in beating a Jew named Moshko Goldshmidt, and might have shot him except for the intervention of neighbors, Lufty's judgment relates.

Lufty rejected Kisluk's denial of his involvement in the incidents and his contention that his duties involved policing minor domestic disputes and apprehending chicken thieves. He also rejected Kisluk's contention that evidence against him was arranged by the KGB.

"Simply put, I do not believe the respondent's (Kisluk's) testimony on any contentious issue," the judge stated.

Spokespersons for Jewish organizations applauded the court's decision and urged government officials to act quickly to strip Kisluk of his citizenship and deport him.

"I think it's a significant victory," said Jack Silverstone, legal counsel for Canadian Jewish Congress. "Every victory is significant."

"Our objective has been, and remains, that the cases associated with war criminals be dealt with as part of the ordinary administration of justice. When [the war crimes unit] wins, it's encouraging. We believe a lot has been accomplished in the last few years."

"We want to congratulate the special unit on war crimes for its signal victory, to see that Nazi war criminals are brought to justice," said Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre.

Littman also lauded Lufty's role in the case. "He did a very sensible thing. He went to Ukraine and held part of the trial there.

"We always insisted there was an air of unreality in trials held in the ivory towers of Canadian courtrooms. By going there, the court got a much clearer picture of what took place, despite the passage of years," he said.

Sitting in Ukraine, the court heard testimony from Kisluk's former grade school classmate who remembers Kisluk and another man "beat and threaten to shoot Moshko Goldshmidt."

Quoting the testimony, Lufty wrote: "They grabbed Moshko. I remember very well, even today, Sergei grabbed Moshko and threw him down to the floor. And they ran and they were beating them with their feet...Sergei drew a handgun from the back holster and probably he was going to shoot him. But then, Kosiuk Uliyan ran to him and started pleading, please Sergei.

"And Kosiuk Uliyan started pleading...don't do it in my house. And then Sergei hid his gun and Moshko left..."

The court also heard of another incident involving Kisluk that occurred in March 1943. An eyewitness testified he saw Kisluk and another police officer name Teshyk escort a young Jewish woman to a forest near the Makovichi police station. "Some minutes later, Mr. Shklyaruk heard a rifle shot. He did not see the shooting but he did see the victim's dead body some moments later," Lufty wrote.

Lufty dismissed Kisluk's suggestion that the witness testified against him because the KGB was out to destroy his family and that "maybe KGB gave him enough sausage."

In finding that Kisluk lied to immigration officers in Germany in 1948, Lufty noted the Kisluk admitted he was asked two questions: his Canadian destination and whether he was a member of the SS.

Lufty stated that testimony from Canadian security and immigration officers indicated "their interviews would never be limited to a single question. Lufty accepted testimony that in December 1948, "prospective immigrants, screened by one of the three-person inspection teams, were questioned on their employment history since 1939." He found that Kisluk must have lied or he would not have been admitted to Canada.

That finding differs from a judgment in the Johann Dueck case in which Federal Court judge Marc Noel found that in July 1948 there was no uniform procedure for interviewing prospective immigrants, and that Dueck was never asked about his wartime activities. He also found there was no blanket rejection of Nazi "collaborators" at the time.

Paul Vickery, head of the Justice Department's war crimes unit, said the case is important on two accounts.

"It demonstrates we're able to establish the requisite proof" for factual events more than 55 years old, and it provides legal authority that recognized the security screening process in 1948, he said.

Had Lufty agreed with Judge Marc Noel's finding in the Johann Dueck case that there was no uniform screening process in 1948, all "pre-1950 cases would have been in jeopardy," he said.

Association for Israeli soldiers raises funds for Neve Midbar

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — As a gift to the Israel Defence Forces to mark Israel's 50th anniversary, the Association for the Soldiers of Israel has contributed to Neve Midbar, a lounge and recreational centre at Ovda, the only base in Israel completely isolated from any city.

The base, located about one hour from Eilat, was constructed about 18 years ago. It had a lounge, but it has since deteriorated and was closed. Base administration has invested some of its own money to make the building usable, but has no budget to complete the project.

At the association's recent tribute dinner, held this year to raise funds for Neve Midbar, Lt. Col. Charlie Ben Simon of the Ovda Air Base, said Neve Midbar – oasis in the desert – is a "dream come true for the soldiers. They are completely isolated, and have nowhere to unwind in the evening.

Ask any soldier, and they will tell you how they long for such a facility," he told the over 700 guests at the dinner, held at Le Parc.

The estimated cost of Neve Midbar is about $500,000.

Israel Ambassador David Sultan, who brought greetings on behalf of the State of Israel, said that we owe Israeli soldiers "the very existence of our state. Military victories have made all the difference between the existence and non-existence of Israel."

Sultan said he is confident that Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak will be a good prime minister, "but he is not a magician.

"The new government must move ahead with the peace process, and there is no doubt that it will move ahead, but even after peace, soldiers have a vital role to play. They will continue to be our shield against regional threats."

Religious, secular divisions said threat to Israel

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jews must foster the sense of unity that they manage to achieve in times of crisis if they are to overcome the problems they face, a panel at Aish Hatorah's Annual Event agreed last week.

The panel discussion, entitled Jews & Judaism in the Next Millennium, took place at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation. Panelists were Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations; Mark Lavie, one-time reporter for CBC News and Kol Israel, and now a correspondent for Associated Press; and Rabbi Avraham Twerski, founder and medical director of the Gateway Rehabilitation Clinic in Philadelphia and Shaar Hatikvah, a similar drug and alcohol rehabilitation centre in Jerusalem. The moderator was Alan Silber.

The division between religious and secular Israelis, seen so strongly in the recent elections, said Lavie, is "a threat to the existence of Israel," more so than the Ashkenazi-Sephardi or even the Israeli-Arab conflicts.

The Shinui party, he said, which ran on only one issue – against the religious – got six seats. Their success was "a reaction to what the secular see as the overabundance of influence of the ultra-Orthodox. The ultra-Orthodox, of course, think the opposite."

It is important to remember, Lavie said, that "secular Jews in Israel celebrate the same holidays and close their schools on Pesach. Ninety-eight percent light Chanukah candles, 45 percent keep a kosher home, and 98 percent attend a seder."

That, he said, is the kernel of hope – that with "love and brotherhood," the two sides can come closer together.

Hoenlein, who said he blames the media for "exacerbating the problem," said Israelis must emphasize what they have in common, not their differences.

"If we focus instead on the miracle that is Israel, then we will be able to deal with each other."

He noted that while many secular are hostile toward the haredim, "the chevrah kadishah who go around after bombings picking up body parts for burial are seen as heroes."

The haredi community must be sensitized to what upsets the secular, such as army exemption for yeshiva students, he said.

Jews must recognize the "historical miracle" that "no Jewish community [in the world] is not free to leave. Instead of appreciating that [and how we worked together to accomplish it], we insult each other."

Lavie slammed "cheque-book Zionism, which allows [those in the Diaspora] to limit their involvement to a financial contribution. What is more important is aliyah."

Rabbi Twerski agreed that there is indeed a crisis both in Israel and in the Diaspora. "We have a common enemy – a life devoid of meaning, where we seek only immediate pleasure.

"This attitude leads to the rise in addictions, assimilation and secularism," he said.

The panel members were passionate in their belief that Jerusalem must remain united under Jewish control. (Rabbi Twerski compared it to a heart: "The right and left ventricles can't be divided and the person continue to live.") However, Hoenlein and Lavie questioned whether the city is not in fact already divided.

Lavie noted that one-fifth of the residents are Palestinians, the city is holy to millions of people and Israelis don't go to the Old City any more. Hoenlein added that the policing and health care are already under Palestinian control.

Hoenlein said it is a mistake to leave the question of Jerusalem to the end of the peace negotiations. "People then will say, 'You are holding up peace for Jerusalem.'"

When Lavie said that the Jewish claim to Jerusalem is "so strong and so right" that Israel might have to be flexible enough to find a formula that will satisfy the world, Hoenlein shot back: "If a thing is too flexible, it can break."

The panelists agreed that Jews must work to ensure that Jerusalem remains Jewish, by aliyah, by increased tourism, by not allowing news reports to shake their faith in Israel, and by recognizing, as Hoenlein said, that "Israel was given a gift. It is a morasha, something that must be protected, like the Torah."

A film showed some of Aish Hatorah's work in the former Soviet Union, with its centres in St. Petersburg, Minsk, Moscow and Kiev. Ilana Rubenstein and Arthur Stern told the hundreds of people at the event about the positive influence the organization has had on their lives.

Introductions were made by Harold Nashman, Aish HaTorah chair, and closing remarks by Norm Grafstein.

Dry Bones

HOW LONG WILL IT TAKE FOR THE CLINTON ADMINISTRATION, THE EUROPEAN UNION, AND THE ARAB STATES TO DECIDE...
THAT BARAK IS AN INTRANSIGENT OBSTACLE TO PEACE?
WHEN DOES HE GET SWORN IN AS PRIME MINISTER OF ISRAEL?

Still in the dark ages

An estimated 12,500 Jews live in Iran. Ever since the Islamic Republic of Iran rose to power more than two decades ago in the folds of the clerical robes of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, they have lived a relatively unharrassed, but uneasy life.

That has changed. They are now, undoubtedly, living in a state of anxiety if not outright fear.

Six months ago, in January, a number of Jews living in the city of Shiraz in the southern Iranian province of Fars, were arrested on charges of spying for Israel ("the Zionist regime") and the U.S. news of the arrests was suppressed until last week because it was hoped by officials in various government and non-government organizational circles that the lack of media spotlight might facilitate a quiet, unpublicized release of the prisoners. In March, more arrests took place.

These hopes, however, have been dashed.

Thirteen men remain in their cells awaiting trial for crimes they did not commit and their maximum possible penalty is death. Among those arrested are the chief rabbi of Shiraz, teachers and students at the local Jewish school.

Israel's Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon, unambiguously declared last week that "not one of the arrested men were involved in espionage, and not one of them has, or has had in the past, any connection with any Israeli intelligence agency."

The United States was equally plain in its denial of any involvement with the people arrested. White House press secretary Joe Lockhart said "the charges were entirely without foundation." President Bill Clinton's special adviser on Near East and South Asia affairs, Bruce Riedel, also said the espionage charges were utterly baseless.

But still, the government in Tehran persists with the time-worn, sinister ploy of scapegoating Jews.

It is time, therefore, to move western reaction to Tehran's thuggish, government-sanctioned gangsterism from behind the scenes of diplomatic activity to full, centre stage.

It is time for governments and citizens to mount an organized campaign aimed at pressuring Iran into releasing these innocent men from their jails and from their bleak, uncertain futures.

Israel's Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron, has called on Jews around the world to assist in securing the release of the "Iranian 13." He has also sent urgent pleas for help to many world political and religious leaders asking them to intervene. Pope John Paul II, UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan, Morocco's King Hassan, and senior Muslim clerics at Cairo's al-Azhur and in Indonesia, have been approached to try to force the release of the prisoners.

The communique from Israel's Foreign Ministry accurately summed up the worries and the fears that lie at the heart of the Iranian initiative. "Israel is worried about these arrests, which have occurred only because these individuals are Jewish. (Our emphasis.) Israel is deeply concerned about their fate and demands their immediate release."

There cannot, in this day and age, be an attitude of "business as usual" with Iran, as long as Iran continues to behave in a manner reminiscent of the darkest days of the medieval ages.

We urge the governments of the west to bring their full political and economic weight to bear in this matter. The government of Canada must lend its voice to the voices in Washington and Berlin, already raised in protest against Tehran. In that regard, we commend MP Elinor Caplan for asking the government of Canada, last week, to try to help free the prisoners.

But it does not rest on government alone to try to rescue the 13 Jewish prisoners of Iran. We too, the Jews around the world, have a role to play. We must not sit idle while the fundamentalists in Iran use the lives of 13 innocent people as pawns in whatever cynical, political game they happen to be playing at the moment.

Congress has allies in opposing kosher meal charge

Nathan Pila writes (CJN, June 3), that it is fair and just for passengers consuming kosher meals on Canada 3000 to pay extra. Pila, however, misses the fundamental point that the unfairness and injustice arise precisely because the airline, in the provision of its meal service, chooses to make distinctions between certain passengers and the minority of others, who for religious, medical or moral reasons cannot eat the standard fare. And it does so even though word from the industry is that the cost, if any, to the carrier is minimal.

Joining Canadian Jewish Congress in protesting Canada 3000's policy are the Canadian Islamic Congress, the Vietnamese Buddhist Association, the Seventh Day Adventist Church, the Canadian Diabetes Association, and the Toronto Vegetarian Association. All of us are encouraged that Canada's other major charter carrier and its two national airlines were quick to assure their customers that they had absolutely no intention of introducing a similar policy. Indeed, a Canadian Airlines spokesperson was quoted as asking, "Why are they charging it? It's just part of the overall service to the customer... it's pretty standard in the industry."

It is not too late for Canada 3000 to change course.

Life is Beautiful has genuine message to tell

I happen to basically agree with Rabbi Gunther Plaut's and Denis Prager's assessment of Life is Beautiful, but from a different prespective. (CJN, May 27)

The most profound message of the movie is: If parents or any caretakers of children produce a protective, creative environment for their children they can tolerate "almost" any trauma or loss. Roberto Benigni, in his creative genius, illustrated that point.

Steven Spielberg's Shindler's List was a relatively "clean" version of the Holocaust, one that was gentle enough to be watched by millions. Life is Beautiful was a next step.

In my work for 30 years with bereaved children and their families, after sadness, anger and every human emotion, laughter is a sign of life re-emerging from the ashes of despair. It is as essential a component of grief and mourning as are tears.

While I appreciate Spielberg's tendency to not respect Benigni's Oscar, I'm pleased Spielberg's wife convinced him to not walk out of the award ceremony.

The story of the Shoah will be told many times over, in as many ways our human imagination can think of, until it's indigestible horror is processed. One never tells a bereaved parent they will "get over" the death of a child. We will never completely recover from the Holocaust, but we must keep trying by telling it to the world again, again and once more – yes, even with life affirming laughter.

Helping build Israel is an act of tikkun olam

In the aftermath of Ehud Barak's election, it is time to change the labeling of the factions of Israeli society. Labeling of any kind is subject to misuse, but the division of Israeli society into camps of secular versus religious is destructive. It would be much more helpful if it was non-Orthodox versus Orthodox or non-observant versus observant.

People's notions of what constitutes a Jewish religious act have to go beyond the notion of what goes on in a yeshiva or synagogue or observing laws of kosher. Unfortunately the non-observant in Israel have often bought into this, and often fail to recognize what they are doing in helping rebuild this modern day miracle is potentially holy. Tikkun olam, (repairing the world), wherever it occurs, is a religious act.

The entire state of modern Israel is a potential temple. It is time that all Jews feel that we have a stake in its development while at the same time recognizing that we can't do it all by ourselves.

Reform Statement of Principles: my view

By RABBI DOW MARMUR

I voted against the Statement of Principles adopted at the convention of the Central Conference of American Rabbis (Reform), held in Pittsburgh last month.

In an address to the leadership of the Canadian Reform movement early in the year, I gave reasons for my opposition. I see Reform as a vibrant, dynamic and diverse movement that is growing and developing all the time. I fear that it might risk unnecessary divisiveness and strife through the creation of an official document. The danger of stumbling is always greater when we analyze each step we take.

Rabbi Arnold Jacob Wolf, one of the giants of the contemporary Reform rabbinate, showed, in a spirited speech to the convention, how the earlier platforms, especially the one adopted in Pittsburgh in 1885, had been stumbling blocks more than guides for Reform Judaism. It is by no means certain the Pittsburgh platform of 1999 will do better.

Though many reasons for dissent have been removed from the adopted document by watering down the original drafts, what is left has lost most of its teeth.

Therefore, despite my agreement with virtually everything that the document seems to be saying, I believe so much has been left unsaid that I could not add my vote to a statement that declares in its preamble that "we believe it is our obligation as rabbis once again to state a set of principles that define Reform Judaism in our time."

Most of my colleagues think otherwise. Once the document has been accepted, it behooves opponents, no less than proponents, to try to understand it and evaluate it as a summary of where Reform Judaism is today. Though I did not vote for it, I regard it as sufficiently significant to offer the observations that follow.

The Statement of Principles does not innovate as much as it summarizes existing attitudes. Hence its support among most rabbis and many lay people. It shows how Reform has moved from its emphasis of tzedek, righteousness, as its defining characteristic, to kedushah, holiness, as the framework within which each adherent should strive to lead a Jewish life.

There are many references to holiness in the document. Affirming the three pillars of Judaism – God, Torah and Israel, each elaborated in separate sections to be considered below – the Statement of Principles says it "invites all Reform Jews to engage in dialogue with the sources of our tradition, responding out of our knowledge, our experience and our faith." And it adds: "Thus we hope to transform our lives through kedushah, holiness."

Like all manifestations of "organized religion," Reform Judaism, despite its success, is worried about defections, particularly by the young, into fringe movements within Judaism and beyond. This is an attempt to reach out to seekers wherever they may be without giving up on the basic of Reform.

As already indicated, apart from the preamble, the Statement of Principles devotes a section to each of the three basic rubrics of Judaism: God, Torah and Israel. Much of what is being said in each is common to all streams and familiar to anybody who knows something about Reform. But there are significant variations.

Thus, having affirmed "the reality of God, even as we may differ in our understanding of the Divine presence," the document reflects what has become known as covenant theology, articulated by thinkers like Eugene Borowitz (Reform) and David Hartman (Orthodox) and drawing on the insights of one of the giants of 20th century Jewish thought, Franz Rosenzweig.

Hence this sentence: "We affirm that the Jewish people is bound to God by an eternal brit, covenant, as reflected in our varied understandings of creation, revelation and redemption."

Another new element is the reference, not only to the holiness of human life, but also to our responsibility to preserve and protect the earth's natural resources.

The document speaks of the traditional distinction between mitzvot between ourselves and The Other (God), and between ourselves and others (humans). Whereas in the past, the former category, often identified as ritual, was neglected, even scoffed at, now it is given justified prominence. Rosenzweig called rituals "gestures of love." Reform Jews are learning what that means in their relationship to God.

The affirmation of Torah describes it as "God's ongoing revelation to our people and the record of our people's ongoing relationship with God." From this, comes the call to "lifelong study in the home, the synagogue and in every place where Jews gather to learn and to teach."

And something new in a Reform statement, though practised in most Reform congregations for the last several decades: "We affirm the importance of studying Hebrew, the language of Torah and Jewish liturgy, that we may draw closer to our people's sacred texts."

Torah is not only learning but also doing. The principles try to combine the two dimensions by stressing the centrality of mitzvot without imposing them on its members: "We are committed to the ongoing study of the whole array of mitzvot and the fulfilment of those that address us as individuals and as a community."

Though this is a repudiation of the old excuse of the non-observant, "I'm a Reform Jew, so I can choose what to do," it does not insist on a unified collective practice in congregations, even while allowing individuals to make their own decisions. However, many congregations have already adopted collective standards, from not allowing smoking at any time to insisting on kashrut at synagogue functions at all times.

One of the discomforts of those who have deep roots in Reform congregations has been that the new emphasis on observance has led to neglect of the traditional Reform stress on social action. This document tries to redress the balance in a long paragraph that seeks to integrate such action with Jewish observance as a whole.

Reform Judaism used to be described as being strong on God, ambivalent about Torah and weak on Israel. The document invalidates that charge. Though its understanding of Torah may differ from fundamentalist views, it is in keeping with what most Jews believe. And its stress on the centrality of Israel – people and land – is unambiguous.

It makes reference to the duty to love the Jewish people and to take most seriously "klal Yisrael, the entirety of the community of Israel." Which suggests yet another point of contact with Conservative Judaism and Reconstructionism. But some Conservative rabbis, especially in Canada, might choose to stress the differences, especially in matters of outreach.

"We are an inclusive community," states the document. This means not only full equality for women, but also openness "to people of all ages, to varied kinds of families, to all regardless of their sexual orientation, to gerim – those who have converted to Judaism, and to all individuals and families, including the intermarried, who strive to create a Jewish home."

Whereas holiness in Judaism always has the dimension of separation, the principles try to combine it with outreach to all. As a general statement, it is most welcome, but when it comes to specifics, the two seemingly opposing trends lead it to be in conflict. The question of same-sex marriages is one such issue. Prudently, the document says nothing about it.

Israel refers to both people and land. Reform Judaism has long ago shed its anti-Zionist image. Two years ago, the same rabbinic body adopted a statement on Reform Zionism, the tenets of which are reflected in this document. They include, not only commitment to Progressive Judaism in Israel, but also encouragement to make aliyah.

However, the commitment to Israel is not to be seen as neglect of the Diaspora. The doucment not only states that the Diaspora has much to learn from Israel but also that "Israeli Jews have much to learn from the religious life of Diaspora Jewish communities."

Critics point to the lack of specificity in the document. Advocates, on the other hand, insist that it is deliberately fluid to inspire congregations to study the sources and to draw their own practical conclusions.

Whether or not such advocacy is justified, the adopted text reflects many ongoing changes within the Reform movement. Contrary to frequent taunts by opponents, these changes are not calculated to resemble other movements in Judaism but to reflect a genuine search for authenticity.

The thirst for liturgical warmth and congregational participation, for social responsibility and home celebrations, as evident in all Reform congregations, is another factor.

What has not yet become apparent is where the search and the thirst will lead us. Characteristically, the principles are silent on messianic hope, whether horizontal-imminent or vertical-transcendent. We are told, perhaps, where we are, but not yet where we should be going.

The drafters of the document insist that it is not carved in stone. It may not take many years before different versions are presented. Perhaps they will fill in the gaps of this one. In the meantime, and despite all reservations, this is a significant record of recent developments in Reform Judaism.

Rabbi Marmur is senior rabbi of the Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto.

The following is excerpted from the Statement of Principles for Reform Judaism approved by the Central Conference of American Rabbis.

This Statement of Principles affirms the central tenets of Judaism – God, Torah and Israel – even as it acknowledges the diversity of Reform Jewish beliefs and practices. It also invites all Reform Jews to engage in a dialogue with the sources of our tradition, responding out of our knowledge, our experience and our faith. Thus we hope to transform our lives through kedushah, holiness.

God

We affirm the reality and oneness of God, even as we may differ in our understanding of the Divine presence.

We affirm that the Jewish people is bound to God by an eternal brit, covenant, as reflected in our varied understandings of creation, revelation and redemption.

We affirm that every human being is created b'tzelem Elokim, in the image of God, and that therefore every human life is sacred.

We regard with reverence all of God's creation and recognize our human responsibility for its preservation and protection.

We encounter God's presence in moments of awe and wonder, in acts of justice and compassion, in loving relationships and in the experiences of everyday life.

We respond to God daily: through public and private prayer, through study, and through the performance of other mitzvot, sacred obligations – bein adam la-Makom, to God, and bein adam la-chaveiro, to other human beings.

We strive for a faith that fortifies us through the vicissitudes of our lives – illness and healing, transgression and repentance, bereavement and consolation, despair and hope.

We continue to have faith that, in spite of the unspeakable evils committed against our people and the sufferings endured by others, the partnership of God and humanity will ultimately prevail.

We trust in our tradition's promise that, although God created us as finite beings, the spirit within us is eternal.

In all these ways and more, God gives meaning and purpose to our lives.

Opinions

The marriage factor

Everyone knows that Canada has been and remains, to a significant degree, a country of immigration. The government sets yearly quotas that it tries to reach: Usually we expect more than 200,000 foreigners to come here and make Canada their home. In addition there is an unspecified number of refugees who turn up at our various airports and declare themselves to be persecuted in their homelands and therefore entitled to remain in Canada.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Altogether we count on about a quarter of a million people to enrich this country with their burning desire to establish themselves in a stable and prosperous environment, and thereby benefit both themselves and their newly adopted country. Without immigrants, Canada would constantly shrink in numbers, for our birthrate is not sufficient to keep the population balance at an even keel.

None of the above may be new to the reader of this column, but perhaps this is: There is not only constant immigration to Canada, there is also a not insignificant emigration from Canada back to the place of the immigrant's origin. Quite a few people come here, try to make it and somehow do not succeed.

This is, of course, not anything that is peculiar to the end of the century. It has always been the case – and that applies also to Jewish immigration after World Wars I and II. Hard as it may be to believe in retrospect, there were always Jews who, after trying Canada for awhile, decided to return to where they had come from.

What caused me to comment on these factors is an article that I have just read, a study of the reasons why people leave Canada after trying to make it their home. Authored by Dr. Usha George and Dr. Esme Fuller-Thomson, the article comes to a surprising conclusion: Immigrants who marry in Canada after arriving here are more likely to stay than those who came as married couples.

I would have thought the opposite was the case, but the authors make it clear that married immigrants not only face different kinds of adjustments, but they also frequently have difficulties in making important decisions about their lives and gaining a proper livelihood for themselves.

Whatever the reason may be, single persons who marry after they arrive in Canada, are more likely to stay than the already married, whose return ratio will be significantly higher.

Also, a male is more likely to stay, and so is a person with a university degree; not surprisingly, the presence of children is also a stabilizing factor. In addition, access to a social support network on arrival is decisive. Where it does not exist, many newcomers will be unsure about their stay in Canada.

Of course, refugees are in a somewhat different situation. Most of them cannot go back home even if they would like to. For others, a marriage contracted in Canada appears to be a vital factor in establishing a sense of stability, comfort and confidence in the immigrant.

An unsettling experience

I have asked Rosalind Karby, director of the Vancouver Jewish Community Foundation and features editor for Outlook (Women's League for Conservative Judaism), who returned from Israel just after Shavuot and the elections, to share a "personal tikkun" on her trip. She writes:

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Shavuot, 4 a.m. – I came to the Kotel to commemorate the giving of the Torah by God to Moses. Like my forefathers and mothers standing at the foot of Mt. Sinai, I wanted to be with my community, to recall the moment that the law was given to the people of Israel.

I came to the Kotel alone. The sky was black, yet somehow there was light in the darkness. I could hear children's voices in the distance. People passed me on the street and birds were awake. I entered the Kotel plaza through Dung Gate, calmly, naively anticipating a unique and spiritual experience.

How wrong I was. For hundreds of haredim, prayer was neither on their lips nor in their hearts. It became apparent that many had come to the Kotel solely to harass, to jeer and to abuse others. As soon as I entered the plaza I knew I had made a monumental error. Not in coming, but in having put on my kippah. Not less than five minutes after I arrived, a small band of teenage boys with payot, black hats and beards began to close in on me, pointing, laughing, and calling me names. The language didn't matter – the tone and body language said it all.

I walked away from them quickly, trying to find a place for myself, a protected space. But the plaza is huge and open and there is little room for safety when others are determined to intimidate and frighten.

On the upper plaza the Masorti "prayer-pen" was noticeably marked off.

Police manned the perimeter barriers and scanned the crowd. I backed away from the haredim, the few swelling now to many, including children no older than 6 or 7. Policemen meant protection.

"Do you speak English?" I asked a policeman in my best Hebrew; then in English, "Get these guys away from me," the latter uttered in panic.

Sandwiched between two uniforms I was escorted through the crowd to the Masorti compound, still subjected to the yells of the haredim, but safely away from their physical intrusion.

The Masorti praying area was inside a triple layer of police barricades.

Clinging to the fence were hundreds of ultra-Orthodox who had come to denounce instead of daven. The entire plaza was a sea of black. I cannot remember a time when I felt such raw fear. I could taste it and it crawled on my flesh. As the day broke with a ribbon of blue, I prayed that God was also awake and would protect my friends and me.

At 5 a.m. our service started. The Book of Ruth, chanted by a man and two women, triggered rumblings in the crowd. The wind changed and you could smell what was coming. The Torah service, read by men and women, was a signal for the heckling and yelling to begin in earnest. A young girl chanted the Haftorah. She began in a sweet, confident voice, until the concentration was shattered by a coke cocktail. But she remained focused.

As she chanted the final blessings, our voices joined hers.

A few more bottles were tossed, but we were watching for them. As we poured out our hearts with the prayer for the State of Israel, the frenzy of the mob reached a crescendo and their ugly chants spilled over our kehilah. The officer in charge urged us to hurry, but we were determined not to abandon Musaf.

An Argentinean woman whose father was killed in the Buenos Aires bombing covered her head with her tallit and led a melodic and meaningful Musaf.

We concluded with Hatikvah, the words particularly poignant as we sang of hope for Israel.

To the end, the missiles kept coming. The police could not stop the throwing of bottles, but with resolve and kindness they shepherded us safely through our service.

7:30 a.m. – I shove my tallit into my bag. There is no time to fold it properly. I am rushed to safety, away from the hatred still simmering in the Kotel plaza. The tallit is stained with sweat and my fear does not subside until I am out of the walled city, making my way home along Emek Refaim.

I am a Jew made in the image of God. The haredim who mocked us are made in that same image. My prayer is that each of us will recognize the holiness in the other, so that respect and tolerance among klal Yisrael will be the legacy for the generations that follow.

A great day for democracy??

Upon opening the new Knesset, Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak declared: "This is a great day for democracy!" It was a great day for Barak but a great day for democracy? After all, Barak must still form a government, and this is where the uncertainty lies.

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

Barak was clearly the big winner in the Israeli elections. His 12-point victory over Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was, by Israeli standards, a landslide. Netanyahu was clearly the big loser but not the only loser: Labor and Likud suffered significant losses. Likud was reduced from 32 seats to only 19 in the new one. Labor faired no better. It dropped from 34 seats to 26 and even had to run under the coalition banner of "One Israel" to fare that well.

Consequently, Barak faces a more divided Knesset than any of his predecessors, and one that will be decidedly more difficult to govern. The culprit here is the law that provides for the direct election of the prime minister. It is virtually impossible – philosophically and practically – to blend a British (or Canadian) style parliamentary democracy with American republicanism, unless one also adopts the "separation of powers" doctrine and the theory of "checks and balances" that are essential to the American system.

Voter thinking is obvious: if with one ballot I can vote for Barak or Netanyahu, why cast my other ballot for Labor or Likud? I may as well vote for a party that more narrowly represents my interests – perhaps one of the religious parties or the Russian parties or whomever. Thus, while Labor and Likud together held 55 percent (a clear majority) of the seats, they now hold only 37.5 percent. A bill to repeal the Direct Election law passed first reading in the last Knesset, but it seems unlikely that it can pass final reading in this Knesset where so many of the parties are, themselves, beneficiaries of the law.

So how does Barak form a government? With One Israel's 26 seats and those of its most compatible opponents – Meretz (10), Shinui (6), Israel B'Aliyah (6), and the Centre party (6) – Barak can count on 54 seats. With the tacit consent of certain other parties, he might be able to govern effectively with a minority. To get to an absolute majority, Barak will have to do one of three things: bring in either Likud or Shas as a junior partner in the coalition, bring in one or more of the religious parties, or try to cobble together some of the very small parties to give him a stronger majority. None of these possibilities seem very appealing, and some of the options might cause his more natural partners to defect from the coalition.

It is not surprising that Barak has been trying to assemble a national unity government. Although the conventional wisdom is that a national unity government will give Barak a stronger mandate to negotiate peace with the Palestinians and the Syrians and pull troops out of Lebanon, there are disadvantages inherent in national unity governments.

First, the essence of democratic government is that the government is accountable to the people. In national unity governments, there is no accounting, and therefore, no accountability.

When I was on sabbatical in Israel in 1988-89, there was a national unity government. That year, there were a number of cases of polio. The cause of the polio was believed to be open sanitation ditches. Who was accountable for this? The Health Ministry which was run by Labor, or the Public Works Ministry run by Likud? I may have these reversed but that only underscores that when there is a national unity government there is no accountability to the people because the people cannot do a proper accounting.

Second, national unity governments are usually hamstrung when it comes to major policy initiatives such as the peace process. It is difficult to move forward on such issues when the overriding concern of the prime minister is to balance everyone's interests so to ensure the continuance of the government.

Third, national unity governments are expensive and inefficient. In a national unity government, each party wants to share in the largesse. Consequently, in the current coalition talks, they are contemplating raising the number of ministries from 18 to 24. They are also talking about naming 12 ministers from outside the Knesset. In fact, what would happen, is that 12 ministers would resign their Knesset seats to make way for 12 defeated candidates to be appointed to the Knesset. More cost, more inefficiency, and less accountability would result.

"A great day for Democracy"? The jury is still out.

The Kirshner File

Violence – the choice weapon of the Palestinians

Palestinian violence flared in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip earlier this month. In what the Palestinian Authority (PA) billed as a Day of Anger, Arab demonstrators marched toward Jewish settlements and Israeli army posts. During the clashes, one Palestinian demonstrator was killed, many more were wounded and several Israeli soldiers were injured.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The demonstrations were conceived and organized by the PA to protest the expansion of Israeli settlements in the territories and the building of new Jewish neighborhoods in disputed areas of Jerusalem. Palestinian officials warned Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak that if he did not reverse his predecessor's policy, an "explosion" would occur.

The Day of Anger was touched off by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's decision to strengthen Israel's hold on eastern Jerusalem. On the eve of the May 17 election, he ordered tractors to break ground for a Jewish neighborhood in Ras al-Amud and to resume construction of a Jewish housing estate in Har Choma. On the following day, his lame-duck government expanded Ma'aleh Adumim – a large settlement on the road between Jerusalem and the Dead Sea – by 10 square kilometres.

The vociferous Palestinian reaction to Ras al-Amud, Har Choma and Ma'aleh Adumim was simply the latest in a chain of violent protests mounted by the PA since 1996 to exert pressure on Israel. Yasser Arafat, president of the PA, threatens violence, or resorts to it, to maintain a certain level of tension during political crises, knowing full well that violence negates the letter and the spirit of the Oslo accords.

If the immediate issue at hand is sufficiently serious, the Palestinians turn to violence, albeit limited, controlled violence.

Over the past three years, the inflammatory issues which have evoked Palestinian ire and subsequent violence have been settlements, the peace process, the thorny question of Palestinian statehood, closure of the territories, or an especially outrageous provocation (such as the notorious poster in Hebron which depicted the Muslim prophet Mohammed as a pig.)

Of course, violence can spin out of control, as the PA now realizes. When the Israeli government opened an archeological tunnel in eastern Jerusalem in September 1996, shortly after Netanyahu took office, the PA responded by encouraging Palestinian civilians throughout the territories to stage riots.

Arafat was not so much concerned by the tunnel as he was by Netanyahu's intentions in eastern Jerusalem. In any event, PA policemen joined the fighting. When the shooting stopped three days later, 15 Israeli soldiers and 61 Palestinians lay dead.

Calm returned to the territories when Israel and the PA got down to the business of finishing talks over an Israeli redeployment from Hebron. An agreement was signed in January 1997. But less than two months later, Netanyahu, in a bid to placate his far-right, announced plans to build Har Choma, a wooded hillside claimed by both sides.

As a result, the PA broke off bilateral negotiations and security cooperation with Israel, and in addition, fomented rioting. These events sent the peace process into a deep chill.

In the next few months, riots waxed and waned in Nablus, Hebron, East Jerusalem and Bethlehem. During this period, nine Palestinians were killed, and Israel's increasingly tense, mistrustful relationship with the PA was aggravated by three suicide bombings which claimed the lives of 24 persons.

With the peace process at a standstill, and with closure taking a terrible toll on the already anemic Palestinian economy, Arafat issued a series of threats in the summer of 1997.

He warned of a "giant explosion." He urged Palestinians "to confront" Israeli measures. He suggested that "all options are open to the Palestinian people."

Yasser Arafat

With these dire threats, Arafat violated Oslo's implicit premise that all disputes should be settled peacefully. But, as Labor party Knesset member Ephraim Sneh pointed out, the Palestinians were being pushed to the edge.

As he put it in a newspaper piece: "In the absence of an Israeli government that sincerely pursues a historic reconciliation with the Palestinians, that demands a vigorous fight against terror but offers no real incentive in return, the danger of an explosion hangs heavy in the air."

Palestinian frustration with the glacial pace of the peace process was also evident in 1998, when the United States, in accordance with the provisions of the Oslo accords, launched a concerted campaign to secure further Israeli pullouts from the West Bank.

When Israel initially refused to abide by an American plan for a 13 percent withdrawal, Arafat stepped up the rhetoric. He warned of a renewed intifadah, the 1987-1991 Palestinian rebellion which cost 1,067 Palestinian and 114 Israeli lives, but which indubitably was an impetus for the historic 1993 Oslo agreement. In the same vein, Arafat said that Netanyahu would bear responsibility for the "chaos" that would ensue should peace talks fail.

Jibril Rajoub, head of the Palestinian Preventive Security Service in the West Bank, was even blunter. "We are preparing ourselves to implement the (peace) agreement, but if he (Netanyahu) doesn't implement, all options are open, including confrontation."

The PA, however, denied a Time magazine report that Arafat had drawn up a three-point plan to escalate violence if the peace process continued to languish.

The Wye memorandum, signed in October 1998, defused tensions momentarily. But in the wake of the first phase of Wye, during which Israel evacuated two percent of the West Bank, Netanyahu suspended the accord, charging the PA with falling short of its obligations to combat terrorism. Shortly afterward, Netanyahu, feeling the backlash of an extreme right-wing cabinet revolt, dissolved his government and called elections.

As these developments unfolded, the Palestinians warned Israel that blood would flow if Israel annexed the West Bank in response to a Palestinian declaration of statehood on May 4, 1999, the end of the interim Oslo accords.

In keeping with the Palestinian practice of threatening violence, Arafat said, "Our rifles are ready, and we are ready to raise them." The PA's cabinet secretary, Ahmed Abdul Rahman, issued a starker threat. "The Palestinian people," he said, "will confront the Israeli military machine with our blood and bodies if necessary."

Two weeks ago, in the most recent example of Palestinian posturing, the PA's chief negotiator, Saeb Erekat, warned of more protests if Barak failed to heed the message that Israel's settlement policy must change. His colleague, Salah Tamari, a member of the Palestinian Legislative Council, spoke darkly of an inevitable "explosion" should Barak puts the seething Palestinian issue on the backburner.

If widespread Palestinian violence erupts again, both sides will be prepared for the worst. The PA, in contravention of the Oslo accords, has been reportedly stockpiling weapons ranging from light arms to rockets and missiles. The Israeli army, meanwhile, has increased special training exercises in preparation for a possible armed conflict with the Palestinians.

It would be tragic if the promise of Oslo dissolved in protracted fighting. But Barak seems intent on revitalizing the peace process, curtailing settlement activity and thereby forestalling violence.

The reasons for sex

Books
Bernard Baskin

Kosher Sex*, by Rabbi Shmuel Boteach (Random House, $22.95).

The central premise of this volume, with its rather distasteful title, is that the reason we seek sex is not physical pleasure but emotional intimacy. If that warmth and intimacy are lacking in a relationship, the partners eventually become bored. Hence, the need for what the author calls kosher sex.

Orthodox Rabbi Shmuel Boteach, born in Los Angeles, has been a counsellor to Jewish students at Oxford University, a popular lecturer and a frequent guest on radio and television.

There is more than a hint of suspicion that he revels in the publicity he receives as a result of his frank and outspoken approach to sexuality. Actually, there is little in his advice and suggestions that is new or surprising.

Someone joked that "Jews are too busy having children to bother with sex." But the tradition, in fact, encourages a husband and wife to have sex, not just for procreation but for pleasure.

Judaism is intensely sexual. Ramban taught in his Igeret HaKodesh: "When sexual intercourse is done for the sake of Heaven, there is nothing so holy and pure...God did not create anything that is ugly or shameful. If the sexual organs are said to be shameful, how can it be said that the Creator fashioned something blemished?"

Adds the Zohar, the most important of Jewish mystical texts: "The Divine Presence rests on the marital bed when both male and female are united in love and holiness. Where there is no union of male and female, people are not worthy of beholding the Divine Presence."

After the destruction of the Temple, the bedroom in each home was considered an aspect of the once glorious and sanctified Holy of Holies.

Of course, the act of sex itself is surrounded by rituals and customs, some obscure, some popular.

There have been Jewish teachers who have fostered various forms of deprivation and asceticism, but they are not part of the mainstream of Jewish tradition.

Not only does Jewish law not mandate that a sheet be used, it even wouldn't allow it if the couple desired it out of a misguided sense of piety. "The ancient rabbis do not allow any articles of clothing to be worn during lovemaking. Sex must bring in its wake this tidal wave of powerful emotion that leaves a couple feeling closer, and this happens specifically through the powerful emotions awakened when the body is caused to tingle by contact with another body."

Rabbi Boteach is in favor of male and female separateness. He favors the separation after menstruation, so that when husband and wife come together again it is "like the time when they first married. They enjoy a monthly honeymoon in which they rediscover each other's bodies...Emerging from the mikvah, is a symbol of physical regeneration and spiritual renewal."

Kosher Sex, with humor, illustration and sensitivity, deals with such emotions and considerations as jealousy, mystery, friends and family, career or marriage, choosing a spouse, and sex for single people.

His advice for a lasting marriage, when all is said and done, comes down to this, "When you feel distance from your spouse, go and swallow your pride. Go back to the person to whom you once committed your life and exert the energy to make the marriage work again. Apologize if need be, even if you're convinced that you're correct and they're wrong. Love is far more important than being right. Lose the argument and win back your spouse."

This is in keeping with the talmudic insight that if a man and woman are truly lovers they can make their bed on the edge of a sword; if the love goes bad the largest bed in the world isn't big enough.

Kosher Sex is not a bad book on a topic of perennial interest and fascination.

Teaching kids about Anne Frank

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Although the Shoah practically defies explanation, particularly to young people, millions of children around the world have been able to grasp some of its enormity through the elegant and simple writings of Anne Frank. And the Internet has become a marvelous resource for educators and their students to share their knowledge.

Some teachers have taken the time to put lesson plans on line. One of the most comprehensive was created by State of Utah [http://www.uen.org/utahlink/lp_res/AnneFrank.html]. Among its goals is to point out that one person can make a difference in the community, at home, at school, in the state and in the nation.

Also check out Daniel Barkowitz of Boston's Temple Israel, who has put together a thorough 12-part class outline, The Truth About Anne Frank [http://remember.org/educate/frank.html], and the Web site put together by Anne Pat Smith and her students at Tefft Middle School [http://www.ncsa.uiuc.edu/edu/Affiliates/Elgin/A_FRANK/annehome.htm].

The students of Albert F. Ford Middle School of Acushnet, Mass., have an interesting approach. They have applied lessons about Anne Frank and the Holocaust throughout their school day [http://www.ultranet.com/~fordms/news.html#af]. In social studies, they looked at how Hitler was able to take control of Germany and how he got a nation to believe in him. Health classes researched the minimum diet necessary for human survival compared to the diet of people in hiding during the war. And students in art classes drew images that symbolized their feelings about the Holocaust.

In another moving exercise, students were asked to put themselves in Anne Frank's shoes and create new diary entries until her death at Bergen-Belsen [http://www2.lhric.org/ths1/annelist.htm]. When you read through these heartbreaking "entries," you see once again how the death of one young girl still resonates more than half a century later.

I'd like to finish my survey of Anne Frank on the Jewish Highway with a look at one of the other incredible individuals of the story. For 25 months, Miep Gies risked her life to hide and feed the Frank family in the annex. Then, after the family's arrest in 1944, Gies rescued Anne Frank's writings and passed them on to her father. Through the World Wide Web, you can follow the life of this modest heroine [http://orion.csuchico.edu/Archives/Volume35/Issue11/News/WsolwAFran.html].

You can listen to a feature profile and interview with Miep Gies from National Public Radio [http://www.npr.org/programs/morning/miep.html] and a short one at MSNBC [http://www.msnbc.com/onair/nbc/dateline/MiepGies/]. To hear these clips, you'll need to use the Windows Media Player [http://www.microsoft.com/windows/mediaplayer/download/].

At the age of five, when the Gies family was living in starvation in Vienna, Miep was taken in by a family in the Netherlands. She knew that given the chance, she would have to do the same [http://www.standard.net/kids_seek/in/SEEKKids/Potpourri/6.html]. "Jan (my husband) and I had no choice. We did foresee many sleepless nights and a miserable life if we would refuse to help, and that was not the kind of future we were looking forward to. Remorse can be worse than losing your life."

Rabbinic Reflections

Torah's ultimate goal

By RABBI YOSEPH OZIEL

Undoubtedly, the question that should be on everyone's mind while studying this week's parshah is: What could possibly have compelled Korach to behave in such a despicable manner in the desert, when he challenged Moshe Rabeinu's right to be leader?

The arrogance and hatred with which he addressed Moshe Rabeinu seems almost impossible to believe. After seeing what the Jewish people had amounted to in a relatively short period of time, from being slaves to the Egyptians to becoming HaShem's chosen people under the leadership of Moshe Rabeinu, how could anybody have had misgivings about the leadership of Israel, when everything was noticeably going right?

In an attempt to answer this question, Rashi quotes a midrash that says Korach felt overly self-confident after he was shown, through divine inspiration, that the likes of the great prophet Samuel were counted among his descendants.

Notwithstanding, as significant a point as this may be, in a way it also complicates things further. The very fact that Korach was worthy of being divinely inspired clearly indicates that he was no simpleton. It would, therefore, be an oversimplification to attribute this man's downfall to a little bit of overconfidence.

In order to understand what took place in Korach's mind, it is imperative that we first understand the fundamental difference between Torah and all other disciplines. Whereas other disciplines occupy only the intellect of man, Torah was designed to address a much deeper level of the human condition.

The Talmud says that when the Torah was given at Mount Sinai, HaShem held the mountain over the Jewish nation and said, "If you accept [the Torah], very well, but if not, here you shall be buried!" Although our ancestors had already willingly embraced the Torah, still, HaShem, for some reason, felt it necessary to carry their acceptance to a deeper level.

If Torah was brought to this world as a result only of man's acceptance, he would view its commandments as optional, subject to his approval. This meagre level of acceptance, however, is simply not enough when it comes to Torah. For unlike other disciplines, which make no real demands on man, Torah must occupy a unique spiritual orbit, captivating the mind and soul of its adherents. When this happens, when Torah becomes the driving force behind man's every thought and emotion, Torah has fulfilled its ultimate goal, which is to mold man into a perfect being.

The mishnah in Pirkei Avot states that there are three bad character traits so powerful that they can "drive man out of this world." These traits – jealousy, lust and the pursuit of glory – in effect, capture the human spirit, completely taking over man's emotions and sense of logic, and become the driving force behind his every move, which is precisely what Torah is supposed to do.

Korach was overcome by jealousy, as Rashi explains in the parshah. As a matter of fact, Rashi in Pirkei Avot uses Korach as the example of one "driven out of this world" by jealousy.

Sadly, as great as Korach's accomplishments were, he was not capable of suppressing his jealousy, and before long, he had surrendered his person to this evil force, challenging even the very validity of Torah.

China tour an eye-opener

By NOREEN AZOULAY

During the recent visit to China of President Ezer Weizman and an Israeli delegation, I was privileged to take part in the first Canadian Seniors Tour.

At present, more than 5,000 Chinese workers can be found in Israel, with 1,400 in the agricultural sector.

"These contracts will generate an additional boost to the development of economic and trade relations between Israel and China," Weizman said.

Statistics showed that the two-way trade volume between China and Israel hit $523 million (US) in 1998, representing a 46.9 percent surge from the previous year.

There was a remarkable 71.5 percent increase in Israeli exports to China last year, as an indication of the strong growth of Sino-Israel bilateral trade.

While nine trade agreements were being signed between Israel and China, with Israeli and Chinese flags flying high at Tiananmen Square in the Forbidden City, 11 Canadians and one American were experiencing China's unique culture, studying the secrets of longevity, visiting historical sites, and enjoying the Beijing Opera and the world-famous Chinese National Acrobatic Show.

Most memorable for me, was the warm hospitality of the Chinese people who opened their homes and hearts to us. Other highlights were visiting the Seniors University, and attending classes and lectures on Chinese art and culture.

While visiting the village of Bao Ding, I witnessed the efforts being made to move families into better housing. Still, many families live in substandard conditions with little more than what appears to be a "beaded" curtain for their front door. One curtain turned out to be rows of paper clips individually wrapped with brightly colored recycled candy wrappers. When I admired their creativity, the husband removed one of the strings to present to me as a gift.

We then visited the new five-storey apartment buildings across the road, where several families now reside, and more will be relocated as the units are completed. When I saw their school, it was apparent to me that in this culture where couples are permitted only one child, the children come first! They study in modern facilities, and are learning geometry at age four. Their play areas are well equipped and the children are well dressed, cared for and happy.

In Beijing, I found myself exercising in the park at 6 a.m. together with residents of all ages. We did everything from tai chi to disco and cha-cha. Because of the importance they place on health and fitness, these parks are filled each morning for daily exercise. When they insisted I join in, I experienced some difficulty keeping up with 70 to 80-year-olds. What a blow to my ego! I have always considered myself to be very fit, being an active hiker, skier and dancer, who exercises at the gym on a regular basis.

Our host family was delightful. Their large coffee table was laden with a wide variety of delicious Chinese foods, and we were taught the art of making Chinese dumplings while I sang karaoke with their 5-year-old daughter to the theme of Titanic, which she had memorized in English.

When we visited the Seniors University, where we were entertained with various performances, we saw costumes of ethnic minorities, met with artists who proudly exhibited their creative works, and toured their classrooms where they were studying computers.

In an effort to promote senior to senior relations in recognition of the 1999 UN Year of the Elderly, China is subsidizing these special tours to bring together North American and Chinese seniors to promote better understanding and lifestyle enrichment through personal contact.

School funding: Fair equalizer

By KEITH M. LANDY
Special to The CJN

Opinion

Rabbi Marvin Pachino has again expressed his misgivings regarding "our community's preoccupation with obtaining government funds" for Jewish education (CJN, May 13). Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region is disappointed that Rabbi Pachino does not support this initiative which, in our opinion, is of great importance to this community and its future.

A core curriculum, secular in content, is taught in nearly every classroom in this province. It is taught in our Jewish day schools, as it is taught in the public and Catholic schools. Why is the same program of study free at public and Catholic schools while our community's families have to pay high tuition rates?

In fact, our community pays twice for the education of our children: once through tuition and once more through taxes. We want the taxes that we pay to go toward the education of our children, irrespective of their school setting. We also want our children to be able to access the non-educational, health and other services they need and deserve, just as children in the public and Catholic schools do so, freely and readily. Denial of such services is plainly wrong and callous.

It has been the longstanding position of our community that the Judaic studies portion of our children's education is to be covered by the community and its parents, not by government. Hence, our community schools would not be relinquishing control over this area of study, because we would not be receiving support for this segment.

Rabbi Pachino alarmingly projects that government might encroach on the Judaic content of our community schools' curriculum. In no other jurisdiction where independent religious schools receive public assistance, has government impinged upon the ability of the schools to set their faith-based curriculum.

Rabbi Pachino further states that once public funding is in place, government may reverse its decision and eliminate such support. The reality, is that Ontario stands alone in the western world in publicly funding one religious-based education system, that of the Catholic, to the exclusion of all others. In no other democratic jurisdiction has the government extended funding to independent religious schools and then reversed itself by withdrawing those funds.

In fact, the opposite is true.

In the western provinces, public support has grown in strength, and has been reinforced over the years to the benefit of independent religious schools and their students. There simply is no evidence to support Rabbi Pachino's scenario.

Congress wholeheartedly agrees with Rabbi Pachino when he writes that the needs of our children and of our schools are not being totally met today. He, unfortunately, does not make the connection between the lack of government funding to the schools and their resultant inability to fully meet the growing needs of our students. Yet, this is the very reason our community has been so aggressively advocating for equal treatment in funding and for access to public health services in the educational system that are currently denied to us.

What Rabbi Pachino appears to ignore, is the simple economics that without outside financial sources the parents must shoulder the lion's share of the total monetary burden. Even with the generous allocation of over 50 percent of UJA Federation-raised dollars to our schools, the community is able to subsidize only a fraction of the total cost of educating our children. It is therefore not surprising that the independent religious schools are increasingly becoming the domain of either the financially well to do, for whom tuition is affordable and the financially less fortunate, to whom some subsidy assistance is extended. The middle class is becoming less and less able to send their children to independent Jewish schools.

The more traditional objection to public funding raised by the government of Ontario is that the extension of funding to independent religious schools would erode confidence in public education. The Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region has researched this matter long and hard, and has found no evidence to support the government's contention. Moreover, the experience of the other provinces do not suggest any erosion of support or confidence in the public education system.

By virtue of his experience, Rabbi Pachino is well positioned to point out our community's school system's difficulties. It puzzles us that he dismisses the most compelling solution to at least some of the difficulties: government funds.

Government funding would cover expenditures relating to the core curriculum; community funds would therefore be made available to enrich and enhance the Judaic-based programs of learning. It would also provide access to existing health services that are presently being denied to our students in the day schools.

It is for this reason that we at Congress will continue to seek redress of this discriminatory practice.

Keith M. Landy is chair, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Shuls essential for Jewish identity: Schorsch

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The synagogue is the most important Jewish institution in North America, contends Rabbi Ismar Schorsch. "All the evidence points to commitment and identity correlating to synagogue membership," he said last week at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Speaking at the Dr. Stuart and Hadassa Rosenberg memorial lecture, the chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) outlined his concept of Conservative Judaism in a talk entitled Sacredness and Sanity in an Age of Uncertainty.

Rabbi Rosenberg (who led Beth Tzedec from 1956 to 1972) and his wife were deeply connected to JTS, noted Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec, in his introduction.

"The mission of synagogues is to make Jews," Rabbi Schorsch said. "If the synagogue succeeds, every sector of the community is strengthened."

Conservative Judaism is distinguished from the more liberal Reform movement – particularly in the United States – for not accepting the principle of patrilineality, not allowing its leadership to officiate at mixed marriages, and not admitting gays and lesbians to rabbinic or cantorial school, said Rabbi Schorsch.

It is distinguished from Orthodox Judaism by being largely egalitarian, he added.

Rabbi Ismar Schorsch

When an audience member questioned the concept of egalitarianism, Rabbi Schorsch noted, "One of the reasons Jewish law has become inflexible is a surfeit of knowledge and a paucity of courage." The largely Conservative crowd reacted with applause.

According to a 1990 population study, Conservative Judaism represents the largest segment of the American Jewish community in terms of synagogue affiliation, with 43 percent of synagogue members belonging to a Conservative synagogue. Reform had 35 percent; Orthodox 16 percent.

The core values of Conservative Judaism are both ethnic and religious, Rabbi Schorsch said.

During a question and answer session, he noted that teaching of prospective converts is not succeeding in the area of ethnicity. New converts still have growing to do, he noted, adding that "we have to work a little harder" to transmit a sense of peoplehood.

The ethnic values of Conservative Judaism include the Hebrew language, the centrality of Israel and Klal Yisrael, or the larger Jewish community.

Its religious values include Torah, critical scholarship and the centrality of Halachah, Rabbi Schorsch said. Most importantly, he added, the concept of God integrates all the values harmoniously.

Today, he said, there are almost 150 Conservative rabbis living in Israel. "Their aliyah is simply an acting out of [a] core value of Conservative Judaism."

Israel needs the Conservative movement, he believes. The country "is not going to make it if it does not allow the creation of religious alternatives."

Torah study in the Conservative movement must be "in consonance with who we are," he said. "We are not 12th-century Jews. We are 20th-century Jews."

Halachah, or Jewish law, "defines our community," said the chancellor. "It defines who's in and who's out, how we worship, how we study, how we relate to our fellow humans, and how we relate to God."

Halachah creates community, as well as the opportunity to feel God's presence, he said. "We come close to God only with serious effort."

Faith is a function of the mind and the heart, Rabbi Schorsch said. Conservative Jews are thus romantics, not fundamentalists or rationalists, he said.

"What is a romantic?" he asked. "An individual who believes more than he can defend."

Today's Conservative Jews are much more knowledgeable about what the movement stands for than those of 30 or 40 years ago, he noted.

He believes modern Orthodoxy will assimilate egalitarianism. "Modern Orthodoxy wants what Conservative Judaism wants. It wants to be in the modern world, and it wants to be thoroughly Jewish."

Conservative Judaism is a vital element in contemporary Judaism, he concluded. If the movement continues on its current course, it will "continue to serve as a bridge that binds and unites."

Rozanski adopts new methods to maintain Guelph's reputation

Academia

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Mordechai Rozanski, the president of the University of Guelph, knows how to attract attention.

To lure students to his Chinese history class when he was still a working professor, he let it be known that they could expect an extra treat: a course in Chinese cuisine. The tactic worked. Scores of students showed up. "I had 10 woks going during class," he said.

When the University of Guelph's athletic director asked him to open the university's new indoor swimming pool, he thought long and hard how he could publicize the event.

He devised a novel solution. Upon delivering the inaugural speech, Rozanski, a waterfront director in a Laurentians camp during his youth, jumped into the water, fully-clothed, and swam across the pool. "I wanted to make a splash," he admitted.

Now in his sixth year as president, Rozanski, a first-generation Canadian, is currently wracking his brain to ensure that Guelph maintains its reputation for excellence. Maclean's magazine , in 1998, ranked Guelph as the best comprehensive university in Ontario and the second-best comprehensive university in Canada.

Recently reappointed to a second five-year term, he said that Guelph was already a first-rate institution when he succeeded Brian Segal, the university's first Jewish president.

"If I can take credit for anything, it may be for cultivating and focusing those qualities that make Guelph unique in a period of financial restraint," he observed.

Rozanski, who has worked assiduously to bring Guelph's strengths to the public's attention, has been an administrator since 1978, when he was director of an international studies program at an American university.

But Rozanski, an expert in Chinese-American relations, has been a teacher and a scholar even longer. A graduate of McGill University, he obtained a PhD in modern Chinese history in 1974 from the University of Pennsylvania, where he began his academic career.

After Pennsylvania, he taught at Berry and Wagner colleges, and Pacific Lutheran, Adelphi and Fairleigh Dickinson universities.

Rozanski has written books about China and higher education, and at the moment, he is working on The Delicate Art of Managing Barbarians: The Role of American Journalists as Instruments of Chinese Foreign Policy, 1900-1930. "The world will have to wait for my retirement before this masterpiece sees the light of day," he said drolly.

Mordechai Rozanski

Reasonably fluent in Mandarin, Rozanski was drawn to Chinese history by a charismatic and influential professor. Since then, he has visited China many times, sharpening his erudition, honing his linguistic skills and, it can be revealed, refining his taste for Chinese food.

Born in Lodz, Poland, on July 4, 1946 – the day of the Kielce pogrom – he is the only child of Louis and Bertha Rozanski, who were raised in nearby shtetls.

Shortly after Germany's occupation of Poland, his parents fled to the Soviet Union.

The family left Poland in 1951, lived in Jaffa for two years and, briefly, in Paris. "We arrived in Canada in 1953. We had been prevented from immigrating earlier because my father had been disabled during the war, and Canadian immigration regulations did not initially allow us in because of this."

To Rozanski, Canada meant the promise of a future, and the means of that future was through education. "My parents did not have much access to education, let alone higher education," said Rozanski, a graduate of Montreal's West Hill High School. "So my philosophy of education incorporates these influences. I want to offer students that promise, to provide accessibility to a quality education and a bright future."

Rozanski's definition of education is an amalgam of pragmatism and idealism. "In an age when vast quantities of knowledge inundate the world, education is the process, through inquiry, scholarship and analysis, of searching for what is right and enduring in the service of quality of life and society."

He holds that education, not technology and globalization, generates forward change and progress. "Technology or globalization uninformed by education," he said, "would be disastrous."

At Guelph, Rozanski has acted on his ideas. Amid provincial budget cuts affecting universities across the board, he developed a strategic framework for Guelph's passage into the next millennium. "Our two primary directions were to focus on being purposefully learner-centred and research-intensive," he explained.

In fleshing out these initiatives, Rozanski established several innovative programs. Start enables students to sample campus life before their first year. Open Learning gives undergraduate and postgraduate students an alternative method of completing course requirements and enlivens the notion of life-long learning.

Internationalism facilitates institutional exchanges with 65 countries. Rozanski will travel to Israel this month to renew opportunities for partnerships with Israeli universities. Project Go helps reduce barriers to higher education and contributes to the diversity of the student population. Guelph has more than 13,000 full and part-time students

As for research, Rozanski is reinforcing Guelph's nationally recognized strengths in fields such as agri-food, biotechnology, human and animal health, aquatic sciences, philosophy and economics.

"We are committed not only to basic and applied research, but to placing that research in a larger context and applying it to improve the lives of Canadians."

Last year, in an effort to capitalize on "existing synergies," Rozanski merged two colleges to form the College of Applied Human Sciences. Guelph, too, has received funding for a Food System Biotechnology Centre and a Centre for Families, Work and Well-Being.

The university will soon embark on a major fund-raising campaign. "In light of funding cuts," he said, "we will be looking to build partnerships so that we may partially – but never totally – offset the shortfall in public funding."

Not surprisingly, he is critical of Mike Harris' budget cuts. "A university education is an investment, not a subsidy. Universities are engines of innovation, creating wealth, jobs and improving the province's international competitiveness. Unfortunately, Ontario ranks 10th out of 10 provinces in terms of per capita support of higher education."

Typically, Rozanski spends much of his waking hours in a continuing struggle to preserve the integrity of the university in an era of budget cuts. "But on a day-to-day basis, I am involved in government lobbying, friend-and-fund-raising, alumni relations, student affairs and managing a $300 million budget and an organization with some 2,500 employees." By his estimate, he attends roughly 1,500 meetings a year, including weekend and evening events.

He and his wife Bonnie, a computer science specialist and novelist, have a son, Daniel, a high school student. They are involved in Guelph's Jewish community and are members of Beth Isaiah synagogue.

Asked how he would wish to be remembered if he resigned tomorrow, he replied: "I would hope that my accomplishments would not be personal ones, but would be reflected in the spirit of the university and the people who come here each day. In the face of an onslaught of massive financial cuts, I would hope that Guelph had not only survived, but actually prospered."

Maissner celebrates 20 years at Holy Blossom

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

TORONTO — Cantor Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple has been immersed in music for most of his life.

An accomplished musician, he began studying the violin in his youth. The Tel Aviv native also enjoyed singing as a child.

He says one of his most memorable moments singing was at the age of 13. Performing on a balcony overlooking a Tel Aviv street, he could see thousands of children holding candles in a Chanukah parade.

This week, Holy Blossom is honoring Maissner's 20 years as the temple's cantor and music director, with a special tribute. The evening includes performances by his colleagues, other musicians, and Holy Blossom's Temple Singers.

Toronto a rewarding place to work

Maissner, 55, grew up admiring his uncle, Cantor Israel Alter. He says his uncle was a great advocate of the intellectual approach to chazzanut, which emphasizes the emotional aspect and the meaning of the prayers.

Maissner trained to be a cantor at Hebrew Union College in New York City and went on to become the cantor of the Germantown Jewish Centre in Philadelphia.

Toronto has been a rewarding place to work, Maissner says, because the city "has a very stable Jewish community. Synagogues flourish here and they are quite supportive of good Jewish music."

Maissner's contribution to Jewish music here includes his direction of the Temple Singers, the only Jewish choir to participate in the Toronto International Choral Festival in 1989. He also leads the Lachan Choir, which has held its own concerts at such venues as Leah Posluns Theatre and the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts.

As a soloist, Maissner has recorded portions of soundtracks for CBC productions, and collaborated with the Toronto Concert Singers, the Guelph University Choir, Tafelmusik and others.

Last year, he returned to the Big Apple to sing at Carnegie Hall with others cantors for the Israel at 50 concert.

In addition to his cantorial duties, Maissner is vice-president of the American Conference of Cantors and past president of the Toronto Council of Chazzanim.

Cantor Benjamin Maissner

Having worked with such influential cantors as Shlomo Ravitz and Moshe Ganchoff, Maissner says he knows what it takes to succeed in the world of chazzanim.

Simply speaking, he says, a good chazzan must possess a decent singing voice and a deep understanding of Hebrew and the prayers.

Also, one must be a committed Jew and a decent human being – a cantor must be sensitive and caring, and reach out to others, he adds.

"We don't just sing. We're leaders of the community. We have pastoral duties to carry out, like caring for the sick and [attending] shivahs. We have to be sympathetic and have strong social skills."

Maissner believes that cantors should be a link to the past, to the old tradition of chazzanut.

Cantorial music can be a unifying factor within the Jewish community, he says. "The fact that Reform, Conservative and Orthodox cantors work for the same cause, for the love of music and chazzanut, has really boosted the community many times."

Holy Blossom Temple has established a fund called the Music Legacy Recording Fund, Maissner says, which will document the musical history of the synagogue.

"I want to document everything because this congregation is very sophisticated and unique."

Moral sensibility stressed

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If one claims to act according to religious law, but does not display moral sensibility, then that is not proper yirat shomayim, fear of heaven, asserts speaker, teacher and writer Arna Poupko.

Poupko, a noted lecturer, is Judaic consultant at Federation/CJA in Montreal. She was speaking at the formal launch of Mekorot Institute of Torah Study for Women, held recently at the Wagman Centre.

Giving an example of the kind of teaching that will be going on in Mekorot, she used quotations from traditional writings and Talmud to discuss the theme Submission vs. Personal Responsibility in Jewish Law.

Pirkei Avot, a book of the Mishnah, asserts that "Without Torah, there is no derech eretz (respect); without derech eretz, there is no Torah," she said, adding Rabbi Kook's belief that "If...the moral character of an individual or a group is diminished by our religious observance, then we are certainly mistaken in our path."

The Talmud says, according to Poupko, that there are "areas where we must act with compassion, going lifnim meshurat hadin, beyond the letter of the law, to have true fear of heaven."

Much of religious observance, she said, citing such examples as covering one's hair, kashrut, and the laws of family purity, depends not on intellect, but on faith, and a "submission to a system and Halachah beyond oneself."

On the other hand, she said, since Jewish learning "insists on always playing the devil's advocate, seeing things from the other person's point of view, it is one of the most pristine ways of honing the intellect."

She discussed differing opinions about how one can be tzelem Elokim, in the image of God; Maimonides says that it is through intellectual understanding, Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik says it is through the creative process, the Midrash HaGadol says it is through acts of chesed, kindness.

But Leviticus Rabbah, another traditional writing, notes that there is an obligation that comes from being created in God's image; to not hurt or humiliate another, she said.

Sometimes it is difficult to see the relationship between Halachah and one's personal responsibility, Poupko acknowledged. Nevertheless, she said, "the beauty of Halachah is that it insists on one's personal contribution.

"On the pinpoint of intellect and submission, lies truth and authenticity," she concluded.

Mekorot president Shoshana Kurtz told the participants that the institute plans to offer four courses beginning in September; Introduction to the World of Talmudic Logic, taught by Rabbi Yigal Gurvitz; Tradition vs. Rationalism in Jewish Philosophy, taught by Menachem Paz; Joseph and His Brothers, taught by Shoshana Zolty; and Kohelet, taught by Rabbi Moshe Shulman.

There will also be a three-session mini-course entitled Greeks Bearing Gifts: Chanukah and the Clash of Cultures, which will be taught by Rabbi Pinchas Brumer.

Locations are to be announced, Kurtz said, but the intention is to make the programs accessible to the greatest number of women possible.

For more information about Mekorot, call 398-1510.

VOLUNTEERS NEEDED

You can make a difference! There are many lonely and isolated seniors in our community whose lives would be greatly enriched by the conversation and companionship that a volunteer visitor could provide. All it takes is a walk in the park, the sharing of a story, a joke or a smile. If you would like to extend your friendship to a senior and have at least one hour available per week, consider becoming a Circle of Care volunteer visitor. Contact Sandra Kingstone 635-2860.

NOT TONIGHT HONEY, I'M TIRED

This proverbial disclaimer for the loss of sexual desire is reaching epidemic proportions as we approach the new millennium. The Starrs', who have been treating couples for close to twenty years, tend to view diminished desire as a symptom rather than as a sexual dysfunction. For instance, desire may diminish with age; as a side effect of depression; in the presence of martial conflict; when one partner has poor sexual skills, and quite often after the birth of the first child. There are other contributing factors to loss of desire but common to most is the wish to avoid the experience of sexual feelings. With the help of the Starrs, you can come to understand your diminished desire and discover ways to enliven your sexual relationship.

Searching for family roots

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Stan Diamond, a retired businessman from Montreal, told a Toronto audience recently that his life took a whole new direction eight years ago after he received a letter from someone he didn't know.

The keynote speaker of a genealogy workshop sponsored by the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada, Diamond explained that the letter came from someone who was exploring his roots and believed Diamond to be a distant cousin.

After receiving the letter, Diamond said, he began to trace his family tree.

In the first of an afternoon of talks attended by about 80 people, Diamond – founding president of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Montreal – described some of the myriad paths along which his research has taken him.

One of his grandmothers, he said, came to the United States in 1892. He discovered that she had left five siblings in Poland. Through diligent research he also "found 42 branches of her family, many of which were wiped out in the Holocaust."

Genealogical research has also enabled him to "identify the great-great-grandfather who passed down red hair to my father and to me."

Diamond, who carries a rare genetic trait, has also used his research to find other potential carriers within his extended family, and warn them of medical risks associated with the condition.

Researching one's family tree allows one to develop certain skills that can be used to help others, Diamond said. As an example, he cited the case of a Belgian-born man named Maurice, who, after extensive searches, had concluded that his entire family had perished in the Holocaust. Through a chance association, Diamond was able to put Maurice in touch with some cousins in London, England.

With a dramatic flourish, Diamond introduced Maurice, who was sitting in the audience. A Torontonian since 1948, Maurice Klagsbrun told The CJN that he has lived most of his life believing he had no living relatives. In April, however, he went to England and visited "a flock of cousins." He has also learned of another branch of his family tree in Australia.

Another speaker, Garry Stein, gave a talk on tracing your Jewish roots, during which he summed up basic steps such as interviewing relatives, visiting archives and libraries, keeping records of your research, and finding tombstones of your relatives and ancestors.

Stein described "leaping over a barbed wire fence" to get into an old Jewish cemetery in Columbus, Ohio, only to be confronted several minutes later with the sight of flashing red lights of a police cruiser. After explaining his quest to the police, he was allowed to continue his search, which turned up tombstones of several relatives.

Other speakers included Gert Rogers, Neil Richler, Rolf Lederer, Henry Wellisch, Alex P. Korn and David Price.

The Toronto Division of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada currently has about 180 members. For information, phone 638-3280.

Help us move into our new home.

The new Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, and The Centre for Cognitive Disorders is going up.

It's going up at a tremendous pace.

The concrete shell of the building will be completed this winter. Anticipation is building. In those areas already poured, the walls of residents rooms are going up, the plumbing's going in and the wiring is being installed. Residents are looking forward to moving into a new facility that's much better equipped to meet the needs of seniors.

And, their anticipation will be rewarded. The rooms will be bigger, and all rooms will be private. Each room will have an entrance foyer and an ensuite washroom almost twice as large as in the current building.

This excellent new facility has been made possible by the generosity of our community. It's a wonderful achievement. If you have made a gift, please accept our thanks. If you haven't, please consider making a contribution to the ongoing work of one of the finest seniors' facilities anywhere.

For more information on how you can be part of completing the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, and the Centre for Cognitive Disorders, call Shirley Worth in the Baycrest Centre Foundation at (416) 785-2500, Ext. 2013.

Pluralist Jewish society requires patience, tolerance

By ELISE LEVINOFF
Special to The CJN

Any discussion of pluralism sparks a debate about the possibility of its existence within Judaism.

Opinion

A definition of pluralism suggests that it is a form of society in which members of minority groups maintain independent traditions. This definition implies little about the issue of cohesiveness within the pluralist society in question, and therefore does not offer any type of solution to the lack of unity that is often observed in the Jewish community.

Despite the lack of cohesiveness that stems from religious differences among the different denominations of Judaism, I think it is possible for the Jewish community to function as a pluralist society. However, this can only be done with patience, tolerance and effort.

I would like to describe an event that I believe illustrates the epitome of a pluralist society in the making.

The scene is a dining hall at Brandeis University, in Waltham, Mass., on a Shabbat afternoon last January. Twelve students from York University and the University of Toronto are chatting about the morning's events and the Shabbat services they attended.

One student comments on her aliyah to the Torah, while another talks about the level of ruach (spiritual uplifting) felt during the Musaf service.

When the conversation begins to wind down, one of the members of the group announces that it is time to recite Birkat Hamazon, to bestow thanks for the food. The students, who are participating in Jewish Campus Services' pluralist mission, better known as the Unity Mission, know that this is going to be a challenge for the group. How will the prayer be recited so that everyone will be comfortable with issues pertaining to tradition, equality, change and Halachah?

The difficulties that arose around reciting this prayer illustrated to all the students – who represented a group of dynamic individuals committed to promoting pluralism within the Jewish university community – that pluralism really is a complicated ideal.

Nevertheless, after 10 minutes of conflict, impugnment and suggestions, a plausible solution was reached. One would lead the preliminary prayer, Shir Hama'alot, another would recite the mezuman (the "introductory" blessing), and yet another would lead the recitation of the blessings within the prayer. At the conclusion of the prayer, all the students felt satisfied, both with the food they ate and with the way they gave thanks for it.

The tradition of resolving the conflicts that threaten the concept of pluralism and unity has fuelled the commitment of the students who were on the Unity Mission in January.

What we observed during that intense weekend visit to Boston to learn about the three major denominations from an outsider's perspective, was incorporated in mid-March into a Havdalah service that selected readings reflective of a pluralist service. Jewish students from all denominations joined together for this Havdalah service, and supported the notion of pluralism and its importance in the Jewish university community.

I believe that pluralism is crucial within the Jewish community. Some type of maintenance of specific traditions employed by various denominations within Judaism must exist, while at the same time, these denominations must respect the changes implemented by others.

With this tolerance and acceptance, we can certainly ascertain whether the statement "Hinei matov umanayim, shevet achim gam yachad – Behold, how wonderful it is when friends can sit together in unity" is truly a statement reflective of the Jewish people.

Galilee Fellowships

TORONTO — The Canadian Committee for the Promotion of College and University Education in the Galilee, chaired by Prof. Irving Abella, recently announced the Galilee Fellowships, in co-operation with the Jewish Agency for Israel and its Partnership 2000 program.

Three regional colleges in northern Israel – Tel Hai, Safed and the Jordan Valley College – are participating in the program, whose aim is to enhance higher education in the Galilee, and create "living bridges" between the academic communities of Israel and Canada.

"The fellowships are an exciting opportunity for distinguished Canadian scholars to spend time in Israel, and experience the Galilee," says Abella.

"Visiting scholars will be expected to take up residence at or near one of the academic colleges in the region for a period of one month, up to one academic year. Soldiers will have a chance to interact with their colleagues, teach and/or consult with faculty and students in the region," he says.

The Galilee Fellowships cover the scholar's travel expenses, housing within the region and an honorarium commensurate with the length of stay. The Israeli colleges are interested in housing scholars from the following fields: biotechnology and environmental sciences, communications, computer sciences, criminology, economics and management, education and interdisciplinary studies, English language and culture, history (with an emphasis on history of the west in the modern era), learning disabilities, mediation, arbitration and negotiation, nutrition sciences, social work and human services, sociology and tourism.

SPONSORED BY FRIENDS OF LUBAVITCH IN THE G.T.A.

On Behalf of the Chabad Lubavitch Network of Institutions in Ontario • (905) 731-7000

On this Thursday, the 3rd of Tammuz (June 17), world Jewry will commemorate the fifth "Yahrtzeit" of the celebrated Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson of Sainted Memory.

Graced by G-d with a towering personality and colossal spiritual profile, the awesome blend of brilliance, loving compassion for every Jew and pragmatic vision he possessed enabled him to positively impact the entire spectrum of Jewish life, changing its landscape forever.

Today, most Jewish organizations have also embraced his holistic and loving philosophy of tolerance, caring and sharing. In his benevolent spirit all have begun to see and feel the needs of those living outside of their immediate orbit and religious and social circles. Consequently, his unique life and times have, and continue to, affect millions.

We ask you to designate this Yarhtzeit-Day to the wellbeing of our people, by increasing your participation in communal activities, religious observances and acts of loving-kindness.

May this bring us to the fulfillment of the Rebbe's lifelong aspiration: A perfect world of peace and prosperity for us all, to be realized, speedily in our days, with the coming of Moshiach. Amen.

Ottawa JCC presents awards for volunteer service

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The community's two highest awards for volunteer service were recently presented to Rabbi Reuven Bulka and Ian Sherman.

Speaking at the 65th Annual General Meeting of the Jewish Community Council (JCC) of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'Ir, executive director Mitchell Bellman said, "A community is only as strong as the people who are involved. Community participation and lifelong learning are important and valuable."

The Gilbert Greenberg Distinguished Service Award was established in 1980, in the name of a late Vaad president. It is bestowed on an individual for exceptional service over the course of many years.

This year's recipient, Rabbi Reuven Bulka of congregation Machzikei Hadas, has already received numerous awards for his efforts, including the Canada 125 medal from the federal government.

Rabbi Bulka is active on several boards and committees in both the general and Jewish communities. He is the host of weekly television and radio programs, has authored and/or edited over 30 books, and also plays in the Jewish men's softball league.

The award was presented to Rabbi Bulka by Robert and Roger Greenberg, sons of the late Gilbert Greenberg.

The Freiman Family Young Leadership Award was established in 1988 to recognize a member of the community under the age of 40, who has rendered exceptional service to the Jewish community.

Ian Sherman, the 1999 recipient, has spent many years on the board of directors of the JCC, currently holding the positions of vice-president and treasurer. A partner at Ernst & Young LLP Chartered Accountants, he is on the Vaad finance committee and is a Vaad trustee.

"When Ian takes on a task, he does it with all of his heart and all of his mind, because that is the only way he knows how to do it," said Ron Prehogan, past president of the JCC.

The award was presented to Sherman by A.J. Freiman, on behalf of the Freiman family.

Ian Sherman holds his Freiman Family Young Leadership Award for 1999. Looking on is his wife Randi and sons Jonathan and Matthew.

Barbara Farber, completing her term of office as president of the Vaad Ha'Ir, presented her final report to the community. She noted that "it was a personal goal of mine to have a shovel in the ground [for the new Hillel lodge] before the end of my term, and we did it – with three days to spare!"

Incoming president Stephen Greenberg noted with pride that "in September 2000, when the new Hillel Lodge is completed, our community will have completed its 20-year dream."

The facility will mark the completion of the Jewish Community Campus, which will serve all segments of the community.

Farewells were said to Hagit and Avishai Goldfarb, community shlichim who are completing their term in Ottawa, and to Chen and Dalia Ivri of the Israeli Embassy, who will be returning to Israel.

The meeting was held at the Joseph and Rose Ages Family Building.

Jewish school enrolment continues to decline

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC) has had to dip into its reserve fund to bail out the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education (BJE), which is projecting a continuing decline in enrolment for the fall term.

The WJCC voted to give the BJE $77,000 to make up for the smaller number of students enrolled.

Since the BJE opened the Gray Academy, which runs from junior kindergarten to Grade 12, on the Asper Jewish Community Campus in September 1997, the student population has declined by almost 25 percent. The school was formed by combining the south Winnipeg Ramah Elementary School, and the north Winnipeg Talmud Torah Elementary School and Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate.

The new school started with about 850 students, a slight increase from the last pre-amalgamation year. Last fall, enrolment at the BJE school was down around 760 students. Currently, 600 students have registered for September 1999, with another 50 or so expected to be registered for junior kindergarten.

BJE business manager Jack Cipilinsky says changing demographics is one of the reasons for declining enrolment.

"Six years ago, the Prairie Research group projected that there would be fewer little ones in the community. That has turned out to be accurate. The younger kids just aren't out there in large numbers. That is something we have no control over."

In the higher grades, the Gray Academy has been hurt by the University of Winnipeg's high school program.

Enrolment in the grades 9-12 level is 135 for September 1999, as compared to 170 last fall. In part, Cipilinski points out, the drop in numbers is because this year's graduating class of 45 was the largest in the school's history. The 1999-2000 Grade 12 class will number 18. "Much depends on the peer group," he says. "For some students, Jewish education ends after Grade 9 or 10 and they leave for the University of Winnipeg."

Finally, Cipilinsky says that perhaps the school system has lost its public perception as a centre of excellence in education. "This is something that goes in cycles," he says. "We went through this in the early 1980s also. We are looking hard at the curriculum."

He also concedes that the BJE decision to go to a middle school concept, introduced at the Gray Academy when it opened, was a mistake. The middle school concept divides the school into three levels with four grades at each level, rather than the former JK-6, grades 7-9 and 10-12 breakdowns.

"We thought that the middle school approach would help, but it seems to have had the opposite effect," Cipilinsky says. "It has given students different exit points. We have students leaving after Grade 4 now.

"Before, we never lost any students before Grade 6. Similarly, we are losing students after Grade 8, whereas before, they were more likely to stay until Grade 9."

Further complicating the Gray Academy's future, is a new observant Hebrew Day School that has been opened at the Herzlia Synagogue in south Winnipeg. The Ohr HaTorah Primary Years Hebrew Day School held an open house on June 2, which attracted quite a bit of interest.

"We had an excellent turnout," says Ellery Broder, president of the new school. "We had a number of phone calls as a result of the open house."

Ohr HaTorah opened its doors last September with a combined nursery/kindergarten class of about ten students. For September 1999, a Grade One class is being added. There are already 12 students registered in the nursery program for the fall, and eight signed up for the kindergarten class.

Ohr HaTorah was started by a group of parents who were looking for a more traditional Jewish educational for their children. When efforts to work out an arrangement with the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education failed to succeed, the parents set out to create their own institution.

"There are always parents who want more religious content," says Jack Cipilinsky. "The problem is, we can't offer everything to everybody. We don't have the money or the student numbers."

The Ohr HaTorah parents began working on the financing two years ago, says Broder. "We knew that without a proper financial base, we wouldn't be able to secure the high quality teachers or provide the curriculum we wanted."

The founding parents were able to link up with the Torah Mesorah system, a network of Jewish day schools headquartered in New York City. Torah Mesorah is providing the curriculum, supervision and a large chunk of the funding Ohr HaTorah needs to operate for the next two years until the school receives government grants. (A new private school has to be in operation for three years before the provincial government will provide funding.) Torah Mesorah's financial support is being supplemented by private donations and tuition fees.

To teach the Grade 1 Judaics program, Ohr HaTorah has hired Rabbi Yaakov Weissler from Montreal. Broder notes that the Grade 1 program will include a computer lab, a gym and swim program, French and music all taught by professionals. As well, he notes, all classes are capped at 12 students to provide an ideal student to teacher ratio.

Ohr HaTorah is currently housed at the Herzlia Adas-Yeshurun Synagogue but, vice-president Molly Morris reports, as the school grows, there will be need to acquire a proper school building.

Media awards presented at BBC convention

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — B'nai Brith Canada's (BBC) 24th annual Media Human Rights Awards were presented during the recent BBC convention here.

Singled out for tribute at the gala dinner was the late John Humphrey, who in 1946 wrote the draft for the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, described as serving as the "magna carta" for human rights around the world.

Humphrey's widow Margaret, attended the dinner, and called for more education of youth to stem the worldwide tide of intolerance and bigotry.

Humphrey's remarks followed a speech by McGill law professor and human rights advocate Irwin Cotler.

Cotler said that while there is a welcomed human rights revolution and "explosion" transpiring worldwide, there appears to be a counter-revolution, marked by continuing genocides and human rights violations, in countries ranging from Rwanda to the Balkans.

Cotler, whose speech was met with a standing ovation, said the Holocaust "did not begin with the gas chambers, it began with words," and he pleaded for an end to indifference and for a culture of respect.

He said the crimes of Yugoslavian President Slobodan Milosevic could have been dealt with a decade ago had "the wall of silence" following the ethnic purges in Bosnia not been erected.

Irwin Cotler

That silence, he said, "opened the door" to the ethnic cleansing of Kosovo.

"You must speak on behalf of those who cannot be heard," he said.

The media was described by BBC president Lawrence Hart and by Quebec region vice-president Steve Slimovitch as playing a pivotal role in that regard.

In a speech during the dinner, Montreal Mayor Pierre Bourque spoke of the need for its citizenry to "stay open to the other, in a spirit of tolerance and mutual good will. I call on you to support this vision which is so close to yours," he said.

The BBC convention, presided over by Hart and convention chair Herb Brownstein, included a panel discussion on anti-Israel bias in the media and the passage of 11 resolutions.

The most noteworthy called for the admission of Israel into the Asia regional group; urged Canada to refrain from "statements or actions in international forums that prejudge the outcome of bilateral negotiations" between Israel and the Palestinians; and called on Ottawa to recognize Jerusalem as Israel's capital.

BBC also pledged to work with the Canadian government on an acceptable Holocaust museum; seek ways to give humanitarian aid to civilians in the Balkans; establish a committee to negotiate with the Ontario government on the issue of public financing of Jewish day schools; and enhance Holocaust education across the country.

JNF pays tribute to Loewith family

By MOURA WOLPERT

HAMILTON — The community paid tribute to the Loewith family at the recent Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Tribute Dinner.

Minna Loewith, her sons Harry, Carl and David, and their wives Liz, Verna and Bonnie, award-winning dairy farmers from Lynden, Ont., were honored by 500 guests at Adas Israel Synagogue, including federal, provincial and local politicians, representatives of the agricultural and dairy industries and Guelph University, and family and friends from across Canada.

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, who sent greetings, praised "three generations of the Loewith family" for their "outstanding record of community service and innovation in the agricultural sector, and for their enduring contributions to the community."

Israel's ambassador to Canada, David Sultan, expressed pleasure at attending a tribute dinner "to a family so dedicated to their country, their community and to the State of Israel."

Proceeds from the dinner go towards developing dairy facilities at Kibbutz Neve Harif in the Arava Valley in Israel.

Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz of Temple Anshe Sholom, the family's congregation, made the official presentation.

Minna Loewith said the evening was a bittersweet occasion because her husband Joe died shortly before his 88th birthday, just weeks after learning of the Negev Dinner tribute.

She recalled the family's arrival in Canada from Czechoslovakia in 1938, their early struggles here, and the help they received from members of the community, particularly, Morris and the late Rose Silbert, the late Dr. Nicholas Sole, neighbors and fellow farmers.

David Loewith described his impressions of kibbutz life in the desert, and dairy farming on Kibbutz Neve Harif, which he and Bonnie personally selected as the family's development project during a recent visit to Israel, and which will be twinned with the Loewith farm.

On behalf of JNF Canada, national vice-president, Dr. Sharon Marcovitz Hart said "The Dream has only just begun. The desert has only just begun to bloom."

Others taking part in the program included Hamilton JNF president, Hilda Rosen, Rabbi Bernard Baskin, rabbi emeritus of Temple Anshe Sholom, and Cantor Efraim Sapir of Toronto's Beth Tikvah Congregation.

Dinner chair was Sandy Silver.

WJCC honors volunteers

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC) has chosen two longtime volunteers as recipients of its two most important awards.

On June 1, at the WJCC's annual Koved Evening, the Max Shore Memorial Award was given to Ron Polinksy, and Evelyn Katz received the Sol Kanee Distinguished Community Service Medal.

In the first half of the decade, Katz was a member of the national executive of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, and vice-president and chair of planning for the National Council of Jewish Federations.

Locally, Katz has been a WJCC board member for 21 years including three years as president. She was recently appointed to the Board of Governors.

Canadian Jews who have served in Parliament or one of the provincial legislatures have always had a certain 'cachet' within the Jewish community. Often, they have been called upon to intervene with their colleagues on issues of particular concern to the community. Always, they are expected to be credible and dignified ambassadors of the community.

Over the last few decades, Jews have almost taken for granted that any given election will yield a group of eigener (our own) who can be relied upon to carry the ball. To be sure, there have been numerous Canadian Jews who have enjoyed successful political careers. Currently, there is a smattering of Jewish representation in parliament that has done great service to the community, while honorably carrying out parliamentary responsibilities.

But what about those who run and lose? These are individuals who have put all else on hold while they seek to serve both the Jewish and wider community. The costs associated with a run at a seat in Parliament are staggering...and then there are the financial costs to consider! The toll demanded of a candidate on her (or his) family, the strain on one's time and resources, compels otherwise stout-hearted individuals to balk at the thought of public office. Placing one's name on a ballot is riddled with uncertainty, with no guarantee of success.

Given those risks, those who do make the decision to offer their candidacies in an election deserve the highest praise. More to the point, they deserve the tangible support of the Jewish community. After all, that same community has no compunction about soliciting their intervention on Jewish issues when the politician is successful in his bid. As with all things in life, "ya gotta give t'get".

This brings us to the efforts of one Barry Campbell. Campbell successfully ran for office in the prestigious Toronto riding of St. Paul's. Although greatly admired by all sides of the House, he decided not to run for a second term. Instead he returned to private law practice. At the same time, he has become increasingly involved in Jewish life.

One of his central messages has been this: Jews – of all political stripes – must become more actively engaged in the political process. They must run for office, they must join political parties, they must become more visible. It is a message to which Jewish leadership should pay some considerable attention.

Families fear for safety of Iranian prisoners

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — Amid an international effort to secure the release of 13 Iranian Jews who face possible execution, American relatives of the accused spies are publicly expressing fears for the lives of their loved ones.

Nasrin Javaherian of San Jose, Calif., is the sister of Nasser Levihaim, 49, the oldest among the prisoners. She said her brother's family was at first reluctant to even acknowledge that Levihaim had been arrested. Iranian Jews have traditionally refrained from making public statements about their situation, for fear of reprisals.

When the charges were announced, Javaherian called her family five times in one night.

"I was so scared, I was crying all the time," she said in a phone interview, trying hard to control her emotions.

She said her brother is the father of three sons, the youngest 18 months old, and a manager of an electric company in Shiraz. She speculated that the Iranian authorities might have gone after him because he frequently volunteered as a Hebrew teacher.

Levihaim's wife has not been allowed to see her husband since his arrest in March, but she can bring kosher food to the prison once a week, a process that involves signing four different papers. "We have no idea whether he's getting the food," Javaherian said.

Javaherian was one of the relatives who met with Rev. Jesse Jackson, who declared his readiness to fly to Tehran together with the same ecumenical team that earlier obtained the freedom of three American soldiers held in Yugoslavia.

Political leaders in the United States, Israel, Germany and France sought to mobilize world opinion on behalf of the threatened prisoners. Efforts are also underway to enlist the support of Italy, Spain, Britain, Holland and other European Union countries, as well as the United Nations, the Vatican, Japan and Canada.

In Washington, resolutions have been introduced in the House and the Senate calling on the Bill Clinton administration and foreign governments to seek the release of the 13 Jews and condemning Iran's treatment of its religious minorities.

While the world outcry continues, many observers are puzzled why Iran would arrest the Jews during a time when the government of President Mohammad Khatami has signaled a desire to improve relations with the west.

Sam Kermanian, secretary general of the Iranian American Jewish Federation in Los Angeles, said the answer lies in an internal power struggle between Iranian moderates, led by Khatami, and fundamentalist hardliners.

"There are conservative groups in Iran which advocate strict Orthodox Islamic values and see any contact with the west as threatening these values, and they try to sabotage Khatami's policies," Kermanian said.

It is the hardliners who control the security apparatus under which the Jews were arrested, as well as the judiciary, he noted.

The high-profile public actions follow months of behind-the-scenes manoeuvering during which Jewish organizations sought to influence Tehran through quiet diplomacy.

The first group of five Jews was arrested in January, Kermanian said.

In the second wave of arrests, Iranian security forces took another eight Jews into custody in late March, shortly before Passover.

The 13 Jews range in age from 16 to 49 and were mainly residents of the southern city of Shiraz; the others were arrested in Tehran and Isfahan, Kermanian said.

During the first months of imprisonment, the Jews were not charged with any crimes, and some signals from Tehran indicated that they might be set free.

Then early last week, in a confusing series of announcements and retractions, Iranian officials accused the 13 of spying for Israel and the United States, which "in certain instances provide for capital punishment," the Islamic Republic News Agency reported.

The espionage charges are ridiculous, said Kermanian. "No one would recruit spies among a group [of Jews] who have high visibility and are constantly watched by the authorities," he said.

In a country riddled with corruption, any nation hostile to Iran could have its pick of spies at $1,000 a month, he added.

The 13 prisoners, including a 16-year old boy arrested in his classroom, are mainly religious Jews, Kermanian said. They incurred the government's displeasure for such "crimes" as teaching Hebrew, holding religious classes and requesting permission to close their businesses on Saturdays.

Following the March arrests, an informal consortium of American Jewish organizations began a quiet effort to mobilize their most influential contacts.

Coalition nears completion

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Senior One Israel sources say that Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak has almost completed putting together a minority government jigsaw puzzle, and will present the government to the Knesset by the end of next week. The proposed coalition will include 59 MKs.

Significant progress was achieved in a series of secret negotiation held over the weekend between David Libai, the head of One Israel's negotiating team, and the representatives of Meretz, Shinui, the Centre party and Yisrael b'Aliyah. A uniform draft coalition agreement between One Israel and these parties has been drafted.

Negotiations with United Torah Judaism (UTJ) are deadlocked over the issue regarding the drafting of yeshiva students into the army. Barak will keep a portfolio for the UTJ, assuming they will subsequently join the government when this issue has been resolved.

An agreement with One Nation has not yet been reached, due to its demand that it be given a cabinet seat despite the fact that it only has two MKs.

According to the sources, Barak had hoped to complete the distribution of cabinet seats with his coalition partners by Wednesday, and will then allocate the remaining seats among his own party.

The likelihood of the Likud joining the future coalition is getting dimmer by the day as the party gears up for an unprecedented leadership battle.

Meanwhile, Professor Alex Lubotzky, who represented the Third Way in the last Knesset, has thrown his kippah in the ring for Meimad's cabinet seat.

Canadian forensic experts visiting Israel

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — Two of Canada's top forensic experts are now in Israel as guests of the Division of Identification and Forensic Science of the Israel Police in Jerusalem (DIFS).

Dr. James Young, assistant and deputy solicitor general and chief coroner of the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP), and forensic analyst Brian Dalrymple are here to tell their Israeli colleagues about the latest Canadian high-tech advances in the fight against crime. They also want to see some of the techniques being used in Israel, particularly in the development of reagents to identify finger prints.

This is Dalrymple's fourth time in Israel, and he sees these visits as an ongoing process to develop new forensic procedures and improve existing ones.

"We have a mutually advantageous relationship with Israel," he said. "It's a two-way learning process. By sharing the results we have with the technologies we use, we find that there are basic differences, for example, in climates. There are a variety of factors which over the years have resulted in frustrations – where Israel would achieve good results in one instance and not in another, and we in Canada also would have both good and bad results; then we want to know why.

"There are also technologies where Israel has been the forerunner in the world," Dalrymple said, "and we very much want to avail ourselves of this technology. By the same token, we have developed some technologies at home that Israel would like more information on. To this end we have hosted our Israeli colleagues in Canada on a number of occasions."

In 1976, Dalrymple, together with colleagues at the Xerox Research Centre in Mississauga, explored the use of argon lasers in detecting fingerprints. This was the first time in the world that this had been investigated, Dalrymple said, and one of the first visitors to the research centre was the current DIFS director of the Israel Police, Dr. Joseph Almog.

That was really the beginning of Israeli-Canadian forensic co-operation, and shortly thereafter, Israel started its own program of laser development and fluorescence as a detection technique.

Under Almog's direction, Israeli forensic scientists were first in the world to look at a basic fingerprint technique called a ninhydrant.

"Dr. Almog and his team performed very sophisticated chemistry," said Dalrymple. "What they did was to redesign the molecule of that reagent in a number of different ways and optimize the reaction and give us the biggest punch for the most easily recordable, longest-lasting, most fingerprints. This was one of the biggest advances in the chemistry of fingerprint science this century.

"In simple terms it turns visual fingerprints purple. There were, of course, up until then, fingerprint brushes and powder, but around 1980, this was a real forensic watershed. Today Israel has one of the top research centres in the world for fingerprint science."

Young was called in by the chief medical examiner in Nova Scotia last September to assist with the identification of the victims of the Swissair crash.

"My real expertise is bringing together all the different forensic disciplines and making them work," Young said.

"This is my first visit to Israel, although I have worked with the Israel Police and Dr. Almog when he has been in Canada. I am interested to see how the contact point is made between the science and the identification officer at the crime scene. I also want to see how the facilities are being used here, particularly as they compare to what we are doing in our lab back in Canada.

"I am looking at new ideas and concepts to take science off the bench and put it to work in the field. I want to make the police more effective in using and gathering evidence. We want to look at our successes, like for instance, the Swissair crash, where we achieved identification of all the victims, and of course, we want to look at some of our failures, so that we can learn from them as well."

Young spoke of an evolving agenda for the future as far as Israeli-Canadian cooperation is concerned. "Brian [Dalrymple] has had a close relationship all along with DIFS. We will be sending more of our people back to Israel to follow up on current research and we expect Israeli experts to continue to come to Canada. We are actively working on joint projects, particularly in the field of identification.

"This visit we want to see the new Israeli-made, copper vapor laser which is an impressive fingerprint tool," Young said.

Dalrymple summed things up by saying, "We don't waste time by reinventing the zipper. If, for example, the Israelis have found that pursuing a particular type of reagent doesn't work because, say, it is too expensive to make or has too short a shelf life, and even that there are health and safety implications, there is no point in redoing that research ourselves. Let's move on to other aspects of that particular forensic science. Let's share our research and not duplicate everything."

Espionage detainees in danger of execution

Espionage is punishable by death in Iran, the AP report said, noting that in 1997 Iran hanged two people convicted of spying for Israel and America.

Israel's Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon met briefly last week with United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan to discuss the arrests.

Annan has made "numerous approaches on behalf of these people," according to Malcolm Hoenlein, the executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, which has been involved in the issue since the Jews were arrested in March.

In New York on a personal visit, Sharon "declared that none of the arrested men was involved in espionage and that none of them has, or has had in the past, any connection with any Israeli intelligence agency," according to a statement from Israel's Foreign Ministry.

"Israel is worried about these arrests, which have occurred only because they are Jewish. Israel is deeply concerned about their fate, and demands their immediate release," the statement said.

The detainees – who are believed to include rabbis, teachers and leaders of the Isfahan and Shiraz communities in southwestern Iran – had been held for nearly three months without being charged.

Testifying before the House International Relations Committee, Martin Indyk, U.S. assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, called on Iran "to ensure that no harm comes to these individuals and to release them immediately."

All three members of the committee, who offered opening remarks at last week's hearing on developments in the Middle East, also raised the plight of those under arrest.

This arrest "is certainly not conducive to Iran changing its image in the West," said Representative Tom Lantos.

"Phony charges against innocent civilians is not a good way for the Iranian government to attempt to re-integrate itself into the civilized world community," said Lantos, who has frequently expressed a desire to travel to Iran.

The announcement of the charges has lent urgency to a situation that Jewish groups have been monitoring for several months.

Hoenlein said much has been done during the past 10 weeks to press the Iranian government to release the detainees.

In related developments, Germany's Foreign Minister Joshka Fischer announced last week that it would also press Tehran for a quick release of the 13 prisoners. Germany, which currently holds the rotating presidency of the European Union, is "gravely concerned" about the arrests, Fischer said.

Khatami's foes blamed

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM – The arrest of 13 Jews in Iran on espionage charges may have been orchestrated by domestic opponents of President Mohammed Khatami in an effort to embarrass him and sabotage developing Iranian-U.S. relations, according to a senior Iranian source.

The Iranian Jews are accused of spying for Israel and the U.S.

Following international condemnation of the incident, Tehran radio reported that the president had spoken of his responsibility for the welfare of all religious minorities.

According to the source, pro-Khatami officials had been seeking to resolve the issue quietly at the end of March, when the Iranian Jews were apprehended.

"I was assured by a pro-Khatami official two weeks ago," the source said, "that the matter would be resolved in a constructive fashion and that the 13 would not be charged with espionage.

"But something changed. I can only see this as an effort by Khatami's opponents to undermine President Khatami in the eyes of the West."

According to the Iranian News Service, the Jewish community there has expressed its disapproval of the foreign show of sympathy. The community says it "has always been loyal to the Iranian people and government, is sorry to hear of this incident, and is confident that justice will be served with full consideration of the rights of the prisoners," the news service reported.

Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau said he knows the suspects are entirely innocent, and called on all Jews, wherever they may be, to pray for their release.

Rabbi Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron, the Sephardi chief rabbi, also spoke out, calling on community leaders in Europe to call politicians' attention to the "outrage... in order to bring about the release of the 13 Jews who have been unjustly imprisoned in Iran."

Rabbi Bakshi-Doron is also reported to have sent urgent pleas for help to many world religious leaders, asking them all to act to save the Jewish prisoners from, as hard-liner Ayatollah Mohammed Yazdi, head of the Iranian courts, put it, "being sentenced to death – not once but several times."

Nazi-looted artwork returned to owner's family

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — When German authorities hand over a $5 million sketch by Van Gogh to Gerta Silberberg in the next few weeks, a small fragment of a destroyed world will be returned.

The 85-year-old widow greeted with mixed emotions last week's news that the umbrella body representing most of Germany's museums, the Foundation for Prussian Cultural Heritage, had approved the return of Van Gogh's L'Olivette, which has been hanging in Berlin's National Gallery since 1935.

"The whole issue brings back many disturbing issues for me," she said at her home in the British city of Leicester. "I wish to continue to live modestly and quietly for my remaining years."

'No one knows how big this problem is'

The return of this work and another owned by Silberberg's father-in-law before the Nazi era – as well as a decision by the German foundation to give its president the power to negotiate directly with prewar owners or their heirs to avoid lengthy litigation – is expected to open the way to claims by other owners and their heirs to thousands of artworks worth billions of dollars, in museums, galleries and private collections throughout the world.

"No one knows how big this problem is, but we suspect it is huge," said Constance Lowenthal, the director of the Commission for Art Recovery, a subsidiary of the World Jewish Congress.

Since the death of Gerta Silberberg's husband Arthur, in 1984, she has been the sole surviving relative of Max Silberberg, her father-in-law.

Max Silberberg was a wealthy industrialist in Breslau, now Wroclaw, Poland, and co-owned M. Weissenberg, a company that produced magnesite, a key ingredient in making steel.

He used his great wealth to amass a fabulous, 143-piece collection of Impressionist art, which was considered one of the finest private collections in Europe.

Works from his collection, featured prominently in German art magazines during the 1920s, included paintings and sketches by Cezanne, Renoir, Delacroix, Degas, Matisse and Pissarro.

At today's values, it is estimated that the collection would be worth some $35 million.

Soon after Hitler came to power in 1933, however, Silberberg's world imploded: the Nazis "Aryanized" the magnesite industry, and Silberberg was suddenly forced out of his job and stripped of his assets.

By 1934, it was clear that he would have to sell his collection of art at one of the many "Jew Auctions" organized by the Nazi Chamber of Culture throughout Germany between 1933 and 1938.

These sales were designed to force Jews in Silberberg's predicament to sell their collections at a fraction of their real values.

"When everything else was taken from them, they could not eat their paintings," noted one researcher.

Details about the auctions have trickled in only in recent years, as records have been declassified.

One reason for the lack of information, is that many of the works that were sold at these forced auctions were later plundered by the invading Soviet Red Army, surfacing decades later in collections in the former Soviet bloc.

There is special sensitivity in Germany about the subject of the auctions.

Not only do revelations of the sales again highlight Germany's cruelty toward its Jewish citizens even before the outbreak of war, they also underscore the extent to which many German citizens must have been aware of – and collaborated in – the process of dehumanizing their Jewish fellow citizens.

German law finally acknowledged in 1989 that it considered artworks sold at these auctions to be looted property.

Archives documented fate of collections

The Silberberg collection was, in fact, disposed of at four different such auctions, but the choicest pieces – 50 works – were auctioned by Paul Graupe, himself a Jew.

Graupe's position derived both from his knowledge of art and from his close business association with the Swiss-based Hans Wendland, who was, in turn, close to the art buyers for both Hermann Goering and Hitler himself.

As the war clouds darkened, fates were sealed: Gerta and Alfred Silberberg fled to Britain in 1937 and Graupe found a safe haven in the United States. Max Silberberg, unable to leave, was arrested and transported to a concentration camp, where he died.

Last week's decision came after Greta Silberberg had almost abandoned hope of ever recovering any of the artworks that had belonged to her late father-in-law.

But her hopes were revived with the fall of the Berlin Wall, and the discovery of an archive from the former East Germany that documented the fate of collections sold at the auctions.

Gerta instructed a Berlin attorney to hire a team of art historians to comb the newly available information. They soon struck paydirt. Not only did they find the Van Gogh, but they also found another picture from the Silberberg collection in the museum – Man With Yellow Coat, by the 19th-century German painter Hans von Marees.

Other paintings in the Silberberg collection are being tracked down, and legal action for their recovery is now expected to proceed – even though the deadlines for such claims have passed.

"The expiration of legally set deadlines cannot be a reason that injustices are not set right," said the president of the German foundation, Klaus-Dieter Lehmann, who is understood to have personally informed Gerta Silberberg of his decision.

Wolfgang Kahlke, spokesman for the foundation, said he hopes the return of the pictures from the Berlin museum would spark further claims.

Anne Webber, the co-chair of the European Commission on Looted Art, described the German move as a "landmark" decision.

"The Nazis carried out the greatest art robbery in history," she said. "They stole one-fifth of all the art in Europe, and much of it is now kept in galleries or private collections."

A spokesperson for London-based Holocaust Educational Trust called the move a "turning point in the restitution procedure," adding that "museums and galleries around the world must follow this example."

Test developed to help fight a cancer early

TORONTO — A team of Toronto researchers have developed a simple test that promises to significantly reduce mortality rates for a deadly form of cancer.

The research is published in the May issue of the Journal of the National Cancer Institute.

Researchers at the Hospital for Sick Children, Mount Sinai Hospital, Toronto General Hospital, the University of Toronto, and the Rouge Valley Health System's Centenary Site have completed a clinical trial of a new strategy for the detection of nasopharyngeal cancer (NPC), a tumor that grows deep behind the nose.

NPC is the major cause of death from cancer in Hong Kong, southern China and several Pacific and Mediterranean rim countries. Most North American patients who develop this cancer are of Asian, Mediterranean or African descent. In Canada, Chinese immigrants, Jews and Inuit belong to high-risk groups.

"Usually this type of cancer is detected only very late in its progress because of its obscure location in the body and the lack of signs and symptoms," says Dr. Jeremy Freeman, Temmy Latner/Dynacare Chair in Head and Neck Oncology and an Otolaryngologist at Mount Sinai Hospital.

"The diagnostic test we have developed can be administered by an ear-nose and throat or general physician on a routine basis and represents a true breakthrough because it detects the cancer at an early stage and allows us to act more proactively," he said.

"In this cancer, every single tumor cell carries the Epstein-Barr virus, and we believe that the virus plays a direct role in tumor development," says principal investigator Dr. Michael Dosch, a senior scientist at the Hospital For Sick Children. "We have now learned to use this relationship to detect the tumor by tracing the virus."

The Toronto team developed an ambulatory testing technique using a sheathed brush. Cells are gently retrieved from the back of the nose where the tumor develops. The cells are then analyzed for the Epstein-Barr virus with a gene-based test. The test has an accuracy rate of over 90 percent. The presence of the virus gene is a strong predictor of the cancer.

"The next stage in this exciting development will be to conduct a large population-based screening test in some of the high risk groups," says Dr. Raymond Ng, an otolaryngologist at the Centenary Site of the Rouge Valley Health System.

"This early screening test will help us identify patients with no overt clinical symptoms. The benefits of treating the disease early and the long-term cost savings for the Canadian health care system will be substantial," he says.

Bye-bye baby at Branson Hospital

TORONTO — Obstetrical services at the Branson Division of North York General Hospital has been transferred to three receiving hospitals, as part of the realignment of services mandated by the Health Services Restructuring Commission (HSRC) in July 1997.

The annual caseload of approximately 1,500 births will be transferred to the three hospitals designated by the HSRC.

- 250 case will relocate to Humber River Regional Hospital, Finch Avenue site;
- 800 cases will transfer to North York General Hospital, Leslie site;
- 500 cases will move to York Central Hospital.

"We decided to transfer obstetric services now because the three receiving hospitals are ready to accept the increased caseload," said Susan Kwolek, maternal newborn program director at North York General Hospital.

Patients are being fully informed of the move. Each receiving hospital has prepared an information package for physicians to give patients. The information package explains the changes and provides details of the new hospital and a map. The hospitals are also contacting registered patients directly.

No jobs are being lost. The physicians are moving their services and 45 nursing staff have all taken positions at the receiving hospitals. Support staff are remaining at the Branson Division.

The Branson Division continues to operate as an acute inpatient hospital with a wide range of services. Emergency, medical, surgical and mental health services will continue to be provided at the Branson Division until 2002. After restructuring, the Branson site will be converted to an ambulatory care with a focus on services for seniors.

An investment in the health of our children for today and tomorrow.

- In the 1999 Budget, the Government of Canada demonstrated its commitment to improve the health of pregnant women and their babies.
- The Canada Prenatal Nutrition Program already funds 280 community-based projects across Canada, and in 400 First Nations and Inuit communities. The Program offers 20,000 pregnant women the support they need to give their babies a healthy start in life.
- Now with additional funding of $75 million over three years, more than 35,000 Canadian women whose health or whose baby's health is at risk will benefit from this investment in communities all across Canada.
- The new funding will make it possible to increase efforts to prevent Fetal Alcohol Syndrome, the leading cause of preventable birth defects in children.
- There are a lot of other ways to give our children a good start in life. For details about this and all of the other services for children, call for your free copy of the Guide to Federal Programs and Services for Children and Youth.

Direct Care provides private ambulance service

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A private company providing ambulances and licensed paramedics to the elderly and infirm for non-emergency trips, says its business is increasing to the point that it now handles 100 calls a week.

The cost of an ambulance from Direct Care within the greater Toronto area is $65 one way, or $120 for a round trip. If the call is from outside the GTA, the cost is slightly higher. Out-of-town calls to Buffalo, Ottawa, Montreal, Windsor, or other cities, are also higher.

In operation for the past three years, Direct Care has a fleet of four ambulances. It says that half of its calls come from private homes. The other 50 percent come from hospitals or nursing homes, when they want to clear a bed for an incoming patient, explains company president Yechonan Buksbaum.

Direct Care often takes the same patient for chemotherapy to Princess Margaret Hospital two or three times a week. The service also gets calls from people at hospital emergency clinics, who cannot wait for the provincial ambulance service if there is a delay

Direct Care has a large Jewish clientele. Among the major hospitals it services are Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and Mount Sinai Hospital, Buksbaum says.

In addition, Direct Care provided a free ambulance service for Israel at 50 and for a fun run at Humber River Regional Hospital.

Though not on a charitable basis, Direct Care also provides an ambulance and personnel at events attended by as many as 1,000 people, and where the risk of someone collapsing is high, Buksbaum notes.

"The difference in the time that it would take another ambulance to reach the site could save a life," he says.

Bed to bed

Many of the calls from private homes originate from children who cannot spare the time from their day to take an aged parent to a doctor's office or a hospital fracture clinic. In such a case, the ambulance might deliver the patient to a hospital, and then return on call so the ambulance and personnel are not tied up all that time.

In a significant number of cases, family members accompany the patients in the ambulance. Each is equipped with such life-saving instruments as an oxygen, monitors, IV equipment and defibrillators.

The service, which is able to take a patient from the second floor of a home, operates on a bed to bed basis. Two trained paramedics accompany each patient on a trip.

Dr. Sheldon Cheshesj, head of the emergency service at Peel Memorial Hospital, is medical director of Direct Care, which runs 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

Condo linked to Baycrest facilities

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A condominium going up at 2 Neptune Drive, a block from Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, will allow owners to age in place, by taking advantage of some facilities in the area, and paying for other Baycrest services, on a fee for service basis.

The 119 units in the nine-storey, Baycrest Residential Properties' building range in price from $130,000 to $260,000. They are available only to those 65 and over, and they offer a life lease arrangement.

The life lease feature enables owners to register the title to their unit to protect them against any future liability.

At any time, or when the occupant is no longer capable of living in the unit, it can be sold for market value to anyone, including family, who is 65 or older, capable of independent living. The new occupant enters into a new lease with the Baycrest corporation.

There are 37 one-bedroom units, including seven with a den, and 82 two-bedroom units, 16 with a den. They are scheduled to be completed at the end of 2000 or early in 2001.

The building has been designed with the special needs of seniors in mind, including entrances for wheelchairs and walkers.

Residents are entitled to membership in the Wagman Centre, on-site activities at 2 Neptune Drive and outings organized by staff of the building. A shuttle bus service will be available from the condominium to Baycrest Centre and the Wagman Centre.

As admissions to all nursing homes, including Baycrest, are now controlled by a central government office, residents of 2 Neptune Drive will have no priority.

A total of 35 percent of the building has been sold to a diverse group of buyers, including single people and couples. One of the new owners is nearly 90, and another is 64 but approaching his 65th birthday.

There is no commercial element, as the ground floor will be devoted to recreation and multi-purpose activities.

The marketing centre at Bathurst and Neptune, at the site of the old Associated Hebrew Schools building, is open Monday to Thursday 11 a.m. to 6 p.m. and Sunday 12 to 5 p.m. Call 932-2560 for information.

Father's Day

Beer makes cooking better for Father's Day

BY EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Father's Day always seemed like a second class holiday to me. There's no big budget push by FTD or Hallmark to get us to send sentimental bouquets or cards to dad and not many phone calls. This hardly seems fair. My dad, like most involved, caring, allowance giving, curfew setting, no-man-is-good-enough-for-you fathers taught me just as much as my mom.

Here is my tribute to my dad, and recipes you can make to show him just how special he is. All of the recipes contain beer, a favorite drink of many of the dads I know.

FOR MY DAD

Thanks, Dad, for teaching me to think logically when you taught me to ride my bike: "If you don't pay attention you'll fall off, break your neck, we'll have to take you to the emergency room and you won't be able to ride your bike."

Thanks, Dad, for teaching me about social acceptance when I wanted to pierce my ears: "If you pierce your ears, everyone will think you're easy." When I asked him what easy meant he told me to ask my mother.

Dad, you taught me about finance when I opened my first bank account: "If you don't learn to balance a cheque book you'll eventually end up broke or in jail for tax evasion."

You taught me about men. You told me that if a guy ever says, "If you loved me you'd let me," then I should say, "If you loved me you wouldn't ask." Good advice but no one ever put it quite like that. Don't worry, I learned to paraphrase.

BEER-BE-CUED CHICKEN

2 chickens, cut up
1 can beer
2 tbsp. molasses
2 tbsp. minced onions
3 tbsp. lemon juice
¼ cup ketchup
1 tsp. salt
2 tsp. sugar

Make sauce of beer, molasses, onion juice, lemon juice, ketchup, sugar and salt. Marinate chicken in sauce overnight. Cook on outdoor grill approximately 1 hour or until done, turning and basting with sauce every 10-15 minutes. Serves 4.

STEAK/HAMBURGER SAUCE

2 cups ketchup
2 tsp. steak sauce
1 tsp. whole celery seed
1 tsp. hot pepper sauce
2 tbsp. soy sauce
⅔ cup dark brown sugar
Juice of 2 lemons
4 tbsp. horseradish
½ tsp. garlic powder
½ tsp. sage
1 tsp. salt
1 can beer
2 small onions finely chopped

Combine all ingredients in a saucepan. Bring mixture to boil. Simmer sauce over medium-low heat, uncovered, for 5 minutes, stirring constantly. This sauce can be made 2 or 3 days ahead of time and stored in the refrigerator. Makes about 3 cups.

ONION AND GARLIC BEER SOUP

For a different take on onion soup, a traditional beef broth base is here spiked with beer and fortified with garlic. Rye bread croutons are great to top this soup.

4 lb. onions (about 10), sliced thin
4 large garlic cloves, minced
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 12-oz. bottle of beer (not dark)
5¼ cups beef broth
2 tbsp. sugar
2 tbsp. unsalted margarine
4 slices of day-old rye bread, crusts discarded and the bread cut into ½-inch cubes

In a heavy kettle cook the onions and the garlic in the oil over moderate heat, stirring occasionally, until the mixture is browned. Stir in the beer and the broth; simmer the mixture, covered, for 45 minutes. Stir in the sugar and salt and pepper to taste. While the soup is simmering, in a heavy skillet melt the margarine over moderate heat, add the bread cubes, and cook them, stirring, until they are golden. Divide the soup among 6 bowls and top it with the croutons. Serves 6.

SPICE TURKEY CHILI

1 pound ground raw turkey
1 medium onion, chopped
3 cloves garlic, chopped
2 28-oz. cans tomatoes, cut up
1 15½-oz. can red kidney beans, drained
1 12-oz. can beer
1 4-oz. can diced green chili peppers, drained
1 tbsp. chili powder
2 tsp. Italian seasoning
1 tsp. sugar
1 tsp. ground cumin
1 tsp. bottled hot pepper sauce
½ tsp. ground allspice

In a Dutch oven cook turkey, onion and garlic until meat is brown and onion is tender. Drain off fat. Stir in undrained tomatoes, kidney beans, beer, green chili peppers, chili powder, Italian seasoning, sugar, cumin, hot pepper sauce, allspice, and ½ tsp. pepper. Bring to boil; reduce heat. Simmer, uncovered, for 30 minutes or to desired consistency. Spoon into serving bowls. Makes 8 servings.

Fathers: access and support

In the May 27 issue I discussed how recent feminist trends in the Supreme Court of Canada may, ironically, undermine the practical ability of disadvantaged women to access money when their husbands fail to obey Court orders. While the Supreme Court has increased the onus on men to support such women, the "social safety net" of public assistance has become less accessible. If men don't obey Court orders for support, then such women and their children fall between the cracks: the Government's support enforcement agencies across Canada (particularly in Ontario) are underfunded and much too slow to act.

The decision of Bracklow in the Supreme Court expands women's rights of entitlement, but perhaps at the expense of those whose husbands fail to obey orders.

With Father's Day approaching, it's timely to examine how Bracklow and other recent case law affects fathers (or "payers"), particularly the overwhelming majority who do obey Court orders and comply with support agreements.

The answer depends somewhat on the part of Canada in which estranged fathers reside. In Ontario, I created a service called the Spousal Support Database. Lawyers across Canada give us details about their clients' cases and we do a computerized search through our database of some 8,000 cases going back to 1992. The search results tell them, in the form of graphs, charts and summaries, what range of spousal support awards have been ordered by the Courts for similar fact situations.

Support orders 50–70%

Our research confirms the views of such noted Toronto lawyers and professors as Tom Bastedo and Carol Rogerson. In Ontario, it is now not unusual for a male payer to be ordered to pay in excess of 50% of his net income for child/spousal support, and the average may be more in the range of 60-70%, depending on the number of children.

Moreover, with Bracklow on the books, it will now be much harder for men to claim that their wives are not entitled to spousal support if there is any reasonable difference between their incomes, even in a short marriage. All you have to prove now is (a) there was a relationship of "interdependence", which exists in virtually every relationship; and (b) the "poorer" spouse is at an economic disadvantage. Furthermore, after three years of cohabiting, one is subject to the same rules of support as if one was unmarried. In other provinces the amount of support ordered is not as high, but the current trend is to follow Ontario's lead.

In addition to support, other areas of family law will make it more onerous for the "richer" spouse to leave a marriage. Homosexual partners are now entitled to support in Ontario after three years of cohabitation, just like unmarried heterosexual couples (see M.v.H. in the Supreme Court of Canada). "Psychological" parents of children who they did not adopt, but treated as their own during cohabitation (married or not) cannot "unilaterally withdraw" from that relationship and are liable for child support across Canada — yes, even in Manitoba! (See Chartier in the same Court).

Access to children by fathers is not normally a problem, especially when support is paid and paid on time. Mothers are less resentful in such cases, although the Courts do not always tie the two issues together, unless there are additional "parenting" concerns about the father and his conduct towards the children (such as "anger control" or "substance abuse").

Paternal custody issues

Courts usually want to preserve the relationship between children and their fathers, because the absence of such contact can sometimes hurt the children. But in cases where mothers refuse to follow agreements or Court orders for access, fathers have no practical remedy to ensure that mothers do so, even if these fathers are obeying support orders. If they ask a Judge to cite the mother for contempt of Court, it can result in an expensive "mini trial". If the mother still refuses, then the Court's options are limited, draconian and therefore rarely used: jail or a switch in custody.

Moreover, if the children are sufficiently mature (there is no specific age of "maturity") and can determine their own desire to attend access visits, it becomes problematic to force them to do so. Usually the intervention of a mediator or a lawyer from the government-funded Children's Lawyers Office can be quite helpful. However, estranged fathers point to "parental alienation syndrome", whereby the mother supposedly influences the children not to see their father, either consciously or subconsciously (through body language or other indirect means).

Although the Courts recognize that certain mothers wrongly influence their children and use them as retaliatory weapons ("You left me for another woman, so why should you see the kids?"), in Canada they have generally rejected the syndrome theory as a psychological model. They have, however, become increasingly suspicious of child sexual abuse allegations raised by mothers in the middle of custody/access battles. According to a recent paper published by Professor Nick Bala of Queen's University Law School, the overwhelming majority of such allegations are ultimately proven to be groundless. During the investigations (which can take weeks or months), a father's access to his child is often cut off as a precaution by the local Children's Aid Society.

This is not to diminish the severity and horror of the crime when it does happen. Professor Bala concludes that most of the women who make these false allegations honestly believe the abuse occurred and are not, from their perspective, lying. Nonetheless, where the allegations are groundless, both the child and the father become victims. This paper can be found on the Quicklaw legal research on-line subscriber service under my database, the "Syrtash Family Law Netletter" or "db sfln").

To conclude, unless the "richer" spouse has a good relationship with his "ex" and can make reasonable financial and custodial arrangements, it's getting much tougher to be a divorced Dad. The only alternative is to disregard the agreements/Court orders at one's peril or to follow our Torah scriptures and avoid divorce at all costs!

Divorce rates are in sharp decline recently. Is this due to the aforementioned legal trends, or Torah reading? Happy Father's Day.

Quotable Quote: Here's Isaac Bashevis Singer on the importance of brevity in literature.

"One of the wonderful things about the Book of Genesis and the Bible generally is that the stories there are very, very short – so short that even a short short story today would be too long in comparison. Often a story is told in five or six sentences.

"I said to myself that modern literature suffers terribly from verbosity. No matter what they tell you, they tell it to you again and again, and it makes it so that there's no place left for the reader's imagination.

"In the Bible, so much is left to the reader that actually the story is but a hint and the rest is for the reader to finish. I don't mean that you should make things short when you have to tell a lot, but to give the essentials, and leave as much as possible to the imagination of the reader."

Former Miss Brooklyn an accomplished photographer

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Over 20 of photographer Sheila Reisman's works will be featured in a solo exhibition titled European Summer, at Sassafraz, 100 Cumberland St., from June 22 to Aug. 30.

Born and educated in the United States, the former Miss Brooklyn's love of photography began when she was 5 years old. To overcome her homesickness when she went to camp, her mother bought her a camera.

"My camera became my best friend and ignited my passion for photography."

As a busy model and as Miss Brooklyn, Reisman recalls that she was more interested in the camera techniques than the glamor of being in the limelight.

She went on to study at the New York Institute of Photography. "I was interested in photographing the beauty of life and nature, and capturing people's emotions."

After her move to Toronto 25 years ago, Reisman continued her photographic studies, and was an award winner for black and white photography at Ryerson Polytechnic University.

Today, her photographs are on the cutting edge of digital processing. She combines old world sentiments with computer age technology, and works in both brilliant colors and black and white.

Reisman's work has been exhibited at numerous group exhibitions at The Engel Gallery of Long Island, George Photography in Toronto, and the Collingwood Library, among others.

Her work is in many private and corporate collections and her photos have appeared in The CJN.

A world traveller, Reisman always has her camera with her. The mother of six and grandmother of 12 captures the human condition and people's unique surroundings.

The Sassafraz exhibition features limited edition photographs which have been digitally transferred to an optical photo CD ROM with additional color processing done exclusively on computer and printed on watercolor paper.

A portion of the proceeds of this exhibition will be donated to Operation Herbie which brings children from around the world to the Hospital For Sick Children, for medical treatment.

Versatile actor learns by osmosis

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Actor Avery Saltzman started his career at the top and stayed there!

Twenty years ago, Saltzman quit his third year York University theatre class, to join the prestigious Shaw Festival and has continued to work steadily in television, film and theatre on both sides of the 49th parallel.

Currently co-starring as Alfred P. Doolittle in My Fair Lady at Mississauga's Stage West All Suites Hotel Theatre Restaurant, the Toronto born actor has appeared on the Broadway stage in Pajama Game and Candide, in Forum, Kismet and Promises, Promises in the United States. In Canada, he has been in Into the Woods, The Mikado, Damn Yankees, Joseph, Sunset Boulevard, Napoleon and Aladdin.

Saltzman's TV roles include PSI Factor, Due South, Traders, and T&T, and his own short-lived sitcom Mayonnaise. A silver screen highlight included being directed by Sir Richard Attenborough in In Love And War starring Sandra Bullock and Chris O'Donnell.

"I have worked with some wonderful directors and actors and have learned by osmosis. Last year, I did Candide on Broadway with Andrea Martin. Working with a person with her dedication is refreshing to me," he says.

"Stage is my first love; I have a great time. Each audience makes a difference. I love the immediacy of the audience, but I also love film. I love the fact that you can dive in, do your work, then it's over with."

Since the actor's father was born in New York, Saltzman is allowed to ply his talents freely in both countries. However, he is an ardent supporter of Canadian talent. "I have sat on the council of Actors Equity for six years working with the commercial theatre community and helped negotiate the Livent agreement."

Saltzman says there is a huge difference between American and Canadian actors.

"I teach a lot of workshops in Toronto and I'm a firm believer in empowerment. A lot of theatre schools in Canada like to tear you down to get to the core to make you act. I think they should be building you up and making you feel terrific about what you do. We also have to educate the Canadian public to realize that what we have in this country is very good.

In My Fair Lady, Saltzman is thrilled to be working with an all Canadian cast. "It's a very ambitious show for Stage West to do. They're very brave to do a three-hour production without an American star. They took big chances with this show and spent an exorbitant amount on the set."

My Fair Lady runs until July 20 at Stage West. Then Saltzman is back in New York for the rest of '99, where he'll be auditioning for a number of Broadway and off-Broadway shows. He will perform in his third workshop for Livent U.S. in a new Marvin Hamlisch Broadway musical slated for the year 2001, based on the '50s film, Sweet Smell of Success, about theatre critic Walter Winchell.

When the actor is not on stage, he spends his free time working out at the gym and hanging with friends and close family, including his parents, two older brothers, four nephews and one niece, all living in the Toronto area.

Saltzman is the only member of his family to have ventured into acting, but he credits his family for instilling values that have helped him on and off the stage. "Our family has always had a great sense of humor and a respect for one another. We were allowed to do what we wanted to do. Our work ethic is, whatever you do, try to do the best."

For tickets to My Fair Lady, call the box office at 905-238-0042 or 1-800-263-0684.

Trio performs unique versions of old standards

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

TORONTO — When Steve Koven was very young, his father played boogie-woogie, rag and blues on the piano. Exposed to music, Koven knew it would be a large part of his adult life.

Koven, 35, is living his dream, and he wants it to continue to roll. The Steve Koven Trio is a 4-year-old Toronto-based jazz group that has accomplished a lot. The trio has released two CDs (Live at the Senator and Sandbox), performed at the Barbados International Jazz Festival and the Jamaica Jazz Festival, and will showcase its talent at the DuMaurier Jazz Festival on June 29 at the King and John streets tent pavilion. Throughout this week, the trio has played at Top O' the Senator.

"I'm starting to find the voice," says Koven, of a distinct personality every jazz musician must have. "It's very important for every artist to have a unique sound. I'm trying to do that."

The trio tends to favor performing energetic renditions of jazz standards, such as Summertime or Honeysuckle Rose. Yet, Koven says, each standard should be different than another musician's rendition. Each musician has various life experiences that must come through in the music, he says.

The Steve Koven Trio, which consists of Koven on piano, Rob Clutton on bass and Harvey Pipher on drums, has received high acclaim. Critics have described the music "as showing a proper reverence for melody" and "rhythmically powerful and expressive."

Koven sees all music as a language, with jazz as a dialect.

"It's about communicating," says Koven. "If I go across the world and meet someone who doesn't speak my mother tongue, I can communicate through music because it's a language. Jazz happens to be my language."

Koven loves playing renditions of jazz songs because "they're so perfect."

Those songs have lasted many years, says Koven, of standards like Summertime by Gershwin and In A Mellow Tone by Duke Ellington.

"I like to make those songs my own," he notes. "We are instruments that take a piece and bring it to life."

Recently, the trio has made several appearances on television. It performed on Studio 2, which airs on TVO, and has done two videos for Bravo! Also, after a cross Canada tour last year, the trio has decided to tour Europe next year.

Koven, born and raised in Toronto, splits his time between the band and Yellow Dog Music, a music school focusing on creative improvisation and composition, which he founded with his wife Katrina.

"Jazz is all improvisation," says Koven. "It's capturing the moment."

When relaxing, Koven likes to listen to classical music and old rock bands like Genesis. He finds some leisure time, thanks to his agent Jaine Brent of London, England who handles the business aspect of the music.

"I listen to a lot of jazz," Koven says. "The more you listen to jazz, the more you understand it."

Growing up, Koven was fascinated by Jewish music. As a member of Temple Sinai, he loved the melodies of composer in residence Ben Steinberg.

"During Sabbath," remembers Koven, "the family got a kick out of the harmonies I used to pull off during the prayers."

As a solo artist or with Clutton and Pipher, Koven has done shows for Baycrest and has performed private functions such as weddings and bar/bat mitzvahs.

After the DuMaurier Jazz Festival, The Steve Koven Trio will be heading to the Hillebrand Jazz Festival at Niagara-on-the-Lake. Jazz lovers can expect the trio to perform at the Montreal Bistro in the fall.

Koven admits he will never stop making music.

"I have a life-long commitment to master jazz," he says. "I have chosen this path, and it is my ambition to play jazz on an international level."

CJN Rosh Hashanah Photo Contest

The CJN announces its fifth annual Rosh Hashanah photo contest. We are asking readers to submit their own original photographs either of Israel or on any Jewish theme in their community.

Anyone can enter except CJN employees or members of their families.

A maximum of three photos per entrant may be submitted. Please write your name, address and phone number on the back of each photo. We can only return the photos if you provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

You may mail or deliver your photos to: The CJN Rosh Hashanah Contest, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, Aug. 16, 1999.

The judges will choose three photographs which, in their opinion, are the most expressive and evocative. These three photos will be published in The CJN Rosh Hashanah issue, Sept. 9, 1999. Each of the "winning" photographers will receive a cheque for $100.

We will undoubtedly receive many worthy submissions. But only three will be selected as the "winners." The decisions of the judges will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

Winning entrants will be notified by telephone before Shabbat on Aug. 27, 1999.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

The musical spectrum

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Trio Lyra
Harbord Street
(Opening Day)

Fresh from the critical acclaim of their debut album Ravel, Debussy and Fauré, Trio Lyra has changed pace with their recent release Harbord Street.

This time the Toronto trio (Suzanne Shulman, flute; Mark Childs, viola; and Erica Goodman, harp) opted for works by local greats – Milton Barnes, Srul Irving Glick, Harry Freedman and Andrew P. MacDonald. The result is very pleasing to the ear.

The title track was composed by Barnes and evokes memories of downtown Toronto where he grew up. Starting off with a slow, piccolo march, it picks up in the third movement, called Ragtime.

The viola, harp, flute combo is rather unique these days and Trio Lyra seem to have mastered its wonderful mix.

"The colors of these instruments," Glick writes, "create a rich, interweaving tapestry." All the compositions on this CD are world-premiere recordings

Harbord Street is released on Opening Day Recordings.

Tsufit
Under the Mediterranean Sky
(Sunbird Records)

On the other side of the musical spectrum is this fun recording from Toronto lawyer-turned-comedian-turned-singer Tsufit.

Under the Mediterranean Sky combines songs with various rhythmic influences including klezmer, gypsy and Middle Eastern.

It begins with a take of Leonard Cohen's Dance Me to the End of Love and ends with Richard Farina's A Swallow Song. In between is a quirky collection of Tsufit's own compositions.

Her ironic take on human relationships is noticeable on most of her songs. In Last Bridge, for example, she sings, "I wrote you sappy songs for years, but now I hate you/ Sweet songs through the tears, but now I hate you/ It's true, get outta my life."

Interspersed are a couple of traditional chassidic songs and the Israeli Erev Shel Shoshanim.

Listening to her beautiful, powerful voice, which is emphasized by the strong, rhythmic Mediterranean melodies, is a real treat. Co-producer and musician Tony Quarrington deserves a lot of credit.

Distributed by Hummingbird Productions, the CD gets its official release in August.

Jazz pianist to tickle the ivories at downtown festival

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jazz pianist Dick Hyman is so popular with local audiences that the folks at duMaurier Downtown Jazz have invited him back to the Montreal Bistro & Jazz Club for an encore booking June 28 to 30.

Not only does the versatile musician tickle the ivories, he's an organist, composer, conductor and arranger for stage, television and movies. He has recorded over 100 albums under his own name and even more in support of other artists. In addition, he has just released a CD ROM called Dick Hyman, One Hundred Years Of Jazz Piano. In his spare time he travels the world giving concerts, recitals, lectures and jazz piano clinics.

Hyman has been playing piano since he was in high school in Mt. Vernon, N.Y. "When I was at Columbia College in New York City, there were a lot of opportunities to play campus affairs and on the campus radio station. After graduation in 1948, it naturally blended into becoming a full-time profession."

In no time, the winner of six Most Valuable Player Awards from the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences made a name for himself as a top studio musician. His credits include musical director for various broadcast programs, including Benny Goodman's last television appearance, and two Emmy Awards for his score for the daytime drama, Sunshine's On The Way, and for a PBS special on Eubie Blake.

On Broadway, Hyman orchestrated the hit musical Sugar Babies. On film, his compositions were heard in Moonstruck, The Lemon Sisters, Billy Bathgate, Scott Joplin, King of Ragtime and Alan and Naomi.

Hyman has had a long-standing working relationship with Woody Allen, composing the music for Zelig and The Purple Rose of Cairo.

"I'm just about finished arranging the music for the next Woody Allen film. As usual, I don't know the name, but it will be released in the fall. The lead is played by Sean Penn; he plays the part of a guitarist in the 1930s."

When he's not on tour, the father of three and grandfather of three enjoys spending time with Julia, his wife of 50 years, at home in Venice, Fla.

Even while at home, Hyman keeps busy. He's performing at the Venice Community Centre in October in a benefit for the Jewish Community Centre. Next April, in neighboring Sarasota, he'll be organizing the millennium Sarasota Jazz Festival, for which he plans to gather many musicians who have played the festival in the past.

In concert

Asked what medium he prefers, Hyman said, "I like to do it all, but the core of it is playing solo piano, so I continue to do a great many recitals, sometimes turning them into a lecture. Being a performer has allowed me to play for so many different audiences. I sometimes think it is a blessing as musicians, to be able to reach out to people and make them happy."

In concert Hyman masterfully intertwines his own unique style, complementing the works of jazz pioneers like Eubie Blake, Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Fats Waller, to name a few.

At Montreal Bistro, Hyman will do a one-night solo performance, and then he will be joined by internationally renowned Toronto pianist Ralph Sutton for two evenings of duo piano.

"Ralph and I were both playing various affairs where they had two pianos. We sat down and began to play together and realized we had a great deal of repertoire and style in common. We have now performed together in a number of places," Hyman says.

"I look forward every time I get to play with Ralph, because we have a great meeting of the minds and its fun to play piano ad lib. We are both improvising. This makes it both dangerous and very satisfying when you do it right. We'll be playing the old standards, Sweet Lorraine, I Found A New Baby, Honeysuckle Rose...We do things we both know very well individually."

Hyman feels his latest CD, Dick Hyman in Recital, on Reference Records, is his best to date.

He has no plans to slow down, he says. "It crosses my mind because people continue to suggest that, since I now live in Florida, I must be retired. I have to defend myself and say, 'Hardly.' I'm not retiring, I will do what I've always done. I might cut down the travel a little bit, but I haven't yet!"

For ticket information contact the Montreal Bistro & Jazz Club at 363-0179 or the duMaurier Downtown Jazz Web site at www.tojazz.com.

Chronicler of the disintegration of the family is a ten-year-old boy, alert to every antic -- sad, wonderful, incongruous and insane -- of his madcap, dysfunctional family. He is their recording angel, capturing at breakneck speed a world in which history and individual lives combine. The result is a richly humane portrait of the inner conflicts of Jewish history, revealed in a hilarious tour de force by a technique it would be a sin to disclose.

Film festival offerings available on video

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

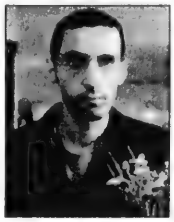
The Toronto Jewish Film Festival recently completed its highly successful seventh season, and one of the questions I have been asked is whether any of the films on this year's program, or past programs, are available on video.

The answer is a definite yes. Although quite a few of the films presented by past festivals are available on video, some of them may be difficult to track down. I will have a look at some of these films and will try to indicate where they can be obtained.

It should be pointed out that some of these films are available in better video stores throughout the country, or can be ordered by them. Others are available from Ergo Media Inc., a mail order company in the United States that specializes in Jewish videos. They can be contacted at 1-800-695-3746 or at www.jewishvideo.com.

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival premiered in the spring of 1993 and one of the best films from that year's program was The Summer of Aviya (Mongrel Media 516-9775 or Ergo), the story of one summer in the life of a 10-year-old girl whose mother survived the Holocaust but lost her mind in the process. The film is based on the life of Israel's foremost actress, Gila Almagor, and was directed by Eli Cohen, one of the leading filmmakers working in Israel today.

The Long Way Home



The Truce (La Tregua)

In the following years, the festival presented the following films: the dramatic film, Good Evening Mr. Wallenberg (Fox Lorber/Orion), about Raoul Wallenberg's frantic efforts to save as many Hungarian Jews as possible from the last minute roundups by the Nazis; Jonah Who Lived in the Whale (Sullivan) which tells the true story of a young Dutch boy who was imprisoned in a camp during the Nazi occupation of Holland; and The Last Butterfly (New Line/Columbia) which describes the efforts of an actor to put on a play in the Terezin camp before being shipped out to an extermination camp.

Also shown at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival were Song of the Siren (Ergo), an Israeli film that explores love and lust during the Gulf War and Genghis Cohn (A &E) a strange British film about revenge and retribution against a Nazi war criminal.

The 1997 festival featured Underdog: A (Sports) War Movie (Ergo) about the passions aroused in an Israeli development town by its soccer team and A Tickle in the Heart (Mongrel), the enchanting documentary about the Epstein Brothers' klezmer band and the music they have played for over half a century.

In 1998 the festival presented a number of excellent films that included The Truce (Alliance/Atlantis), the true story of Italian writer/philosopher Primo Levi, who was liberated from Auschwitz, and then spent a year trying to make his way back to his native land. Also shown that year was Mendel (CHV), the story of a young boy and his family's attempts to return to an ordinary life after the war.

1998 also saw the screening of The Long Way Home (Morningstar), a documentary about the thousands of Jewish DP's after the War and the Israeli classic, Sallah (Ergo), one of the funniest films ever produced, in Israel or anywhere else.

That year's program also included Blood Money: Switzerland's Nazi Gold (Ergo), a very timely presentation that exposes the shameful behavior of Swiss bankers who accepted millions of dollars in deposits from Jewish depositors, before and during the war, and then refused to return the money to the survivors after the war.

Mendel

Salla

This year's festival also presented a number of excellent films that are available on video. The Diane Keaton directed comedy, Unstrung Heroes (Disney), has been available at video stores for some time and is an offkilter farce about a young Jewish boy who moves in with his eccentric uncles after his mother contracts a terminal illness.

The two Yiddish classics shown at this year's festival, The Light Ahead and The Singing Blacksmith are both available from Ergo, as is the Israeli short film, Hitchhikers.

There are other films that are available on video. Some of them can be obtained through Ergo. Others require a more protracted search. In the future, I hope to have an opportunity to outline a few of the more obscure sources for Jewish videos.

Self-improvement books popular with rabbis

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

In an era when bookstores prominently display multiple versions of the popular Chicken Soup for the Soul, it is clear that the masses crave the sort of spiritual nourishment promised by self-improvement literature.

This genre, not surprisingly, has proven popular with rabbis. One runaway bestseller of the last decade or so, is Rabbi Harold Kushner's When Bad Things Happen to Good People. One might also include Rabbi Shmuel Boteach's more recent title, Kosher Sex.

This apparently substantial category of modern rabbinical literature runs the gamut from Reform to black hat. Even kabbalists have rushed into the literary arena

Rabbi Naomi Levy, the first woman to lead a Conservative congregation on the U.S. west coast, recently added to the genre with To Begin Again: The Journey Toward Comfort, Strength, and Faith in Difficult Times (Knopf, $32).

Rabbi Levy was in the first class to admit women to study for the rabbinate at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, but much of her learning evidently came from the much harder school of real life. Her father died abruptly, the victim of a shooting, when she was 15.

The school of real life

Rabbis are privy, often on a daily basis, to myriad tales of suffering and hardship. Rabbi Levy presents a bounteous crop of woes that cannot be dismissed lightly.

A woman takes years to recover after being raped; a couple tries to rebuild their life after losing their daughter; a cancer patient tries to live his remaining moments with dignity and purpose.

Moral imperative

In each case, the rabbi focuses on the hidden good of such trials, their constructive purpose, and the moral imperative to find the life-affirming values in the devastating aftermath of personal crises.

So brimming are these pages with heart-breaking problems and lamentations that the book sounds at times like A Bintel Brief, the famous advice column of the Yiddish Forward from earlier in this century.

However, Rabbi Levy offers the long view, the view of heaven, with clarity and compassion.

She is gifted at seeing the path towards peace and comfort which may, in difficult times, be elusive. Many of her 33 chapters conclude with simple prayers composed by her.

Offering comfort to those who need it, To Begin Again, which is part secular and part holy, is another example of a contemporary wisdom book that seems to sip at ancient founts.

While readers may find less diluted forms of the same wisdom in Proverbs, Psalms and Jonah, Rabbi Levy is to be commended for providing a warm and compassionate context, and especially for turning her suffering into a constructive tool for the benefit of others.

Pan-Am Maccabi competition in Mexico City

Soccer midfielder spearheads Canadian team

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dan Sankar's soccer career has taken him to a lot of places in his 30 years. This summer, he'll add Mexico City on his resume.

Sankar is a key member of the Canadian indoor soccer team that will fly down to Mexico to take part in the 9th Pan-American Maccabi Games in July. An attacking midfielder who scores goals in bunches, Sankar has spent the last five years of his career living in Vancouver, playing for the Indo-Canadian Football Club and prior to that, for Westview Soccer Club.

Cosmopolitan by heritage, Sankar's family hails from India. Searching for greater opportunity, they moved to Toronto where Dan was born. He grew up in Oakville, Ont. where he played for the Oakville Soccer Club until age 18.

His skill earned him a four-year NCAA Division 1 athletic scholarship at Dartmouth College in New Hampshire. Between Dartmouth and Vancouver, Sankar played briefly for the defunct Toronto Shooting Stars and for the North York Rockers in the Canadian Soccer League.

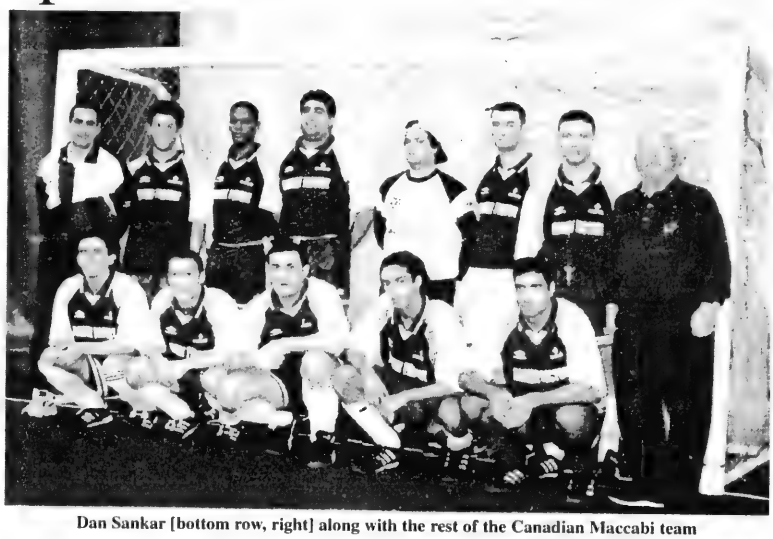
A true cosmopolitan when it comes to the world of soccer, his skills also earned him a spot on the indoor soccer team that represented Canada at the 1997 Maccabiah Games in Israel.

More recently, he ended the 1999 season playing in British Columbia for the Indo-Canadians, who lost the provincial championship in double overtime. With three men red-carded for various infractions, the Indo-Canadians went down to defeat to Metro Ford of Vancouver on a penalty shot awarded with only 10 minutes left to play.

It was a tough way to end their season – one that was otherwise personally satisfying for Sankar. He led the team in goal scoring, notching 23 in 27 games.

The Indo-Canadians play in the province's top league. "We take it very seriously," said Sankar, who plans to enrol in the PhD program in psychology at the University of British Columbia next year.

At five foot eight, 160 lbs., Sankar is a dynamic striker/attacking midfielder for whom "speed is a key part of my game. If I've gotten enough sleep the night before, my touch is good and so is my dribbling ability in the attacking one-third," he said.



Dan Sankar [bottom row, right] along with the rest of the Canadian Maccabi team

"I've scored a fair number of goals over the years, but I like to think of myself as more of a possession guy, who plays well with the other guys."

Consisting mostly of Hindus, Sikhs and Muslims, the Indo-Canadians are mostly young Indians, with Sankar the lone Jew. Although he was born in Toronto, his family traces back its Indian roots hundreds of years.

There are three "tribes" of Indian Jews, he explained. One of the better known tribes lived in Cochin, south of Goa, and boasted one of the oldest synagogues in Asia.

A second group of Jews lived in Calcutta. They were descended from Iraqi Jews, who moved to India for business and trade reasons.

The third group is the B'nai Yisrael who live in Bombay. Dan's late father Moses, was from Bombay and his mother Esther, was born in Karachi, Pakistan. Like other Jewish immigrants to Toronto, the Indian Jews stuck together. Dan remembers attending High Holy Day services at the National Council of Jewish Women's building on Bathurst Street, along with about a dozen other Indian Jewish families. Nowadays, about 50 families take part in the services, he said.

Sankar has travelled to India a couple of times, visiting relatives in Bombay and New Delhi. "It's the closest thing to being on another planet without leaving the planet," he said.

Two years ago, during the Maccabiah Games in Israel, Sankar met a member of the Indian team who, it turned out, knew his family in India. Talk about a small world.

Straddling two worlds, Jewish and Indian, Sankar has gotten many quizzical looks from people who've never before met an Indian Jew. His soccer teammates didn't know such a creature even existed, he said.

At High Holy Day services in Richmond, B..C. last year, members of the congregation were curious about the new addition to their community, he added.

The downside of his background is the racism he's experienced. In Canada, the racism is subtle, but it's there. "We're a peaceful nation and no one comes out and says it, but I really think it breeds in some circles," he contends.

"It's hard to prove, but I think the Canadian soccer community wouldn't rate many Indian players," he said. "They wouldn't open their eyes to see if I can play."

Not so Martin Scott, organizer and coach of the Canadian Maccabi team. He's happy to have Sankar on the team, which consists of players with origins ranging from Russia to Israel to Argentina.

Others recruited for the squad include: Irvin Studin, Ziv Fishman, Ruven Hay Chaia, Ofer Winkler, Roy Haviv, Eliezer Amir and Mike Leichenko.

The Inside Back

Look inward this Father's Day

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

Good Jewish men hitting their wives? It happens, despite our tendency to downplay or turn away from unpleasant social ills. Violence, anger, aggression, threatening language... even road rage. We are not immune.

The ancient Roman magistrate Cato wrote that an angry man opens his mouth and shuts his eyes. So it could be said that the goal of a groundbreaking anger management and abuse prevention program for men offered by Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) opens men's eyes – and, it's hoped, their hearts.

David openly admits that he hit his first wife. His inability to deal with anger – and the everyday irritants which triggered it – finally crystallized for him when he realized that the same cycle of violence was repeating itself with his second wife.

"It got so bad that she threw the phone at me," David, a stout man in his 40s, recalls calmly. "That just enraged me. But I realize now that she probably did it as a defence. I must have followed her from room to room, yelling the whole time."

He says "must have" because his memories of these episodes of blinding anger with his second wife are foggy. He does recall that their three children were "traumatized" by his behavior, which, even though it did not involve direct physical violence, was verbally and emotionally abusive.

Things came to a head when the police were called one night during a particularly nasty yelling match. No arrests were made, but David was shaken up. He and his wife separated for six months.

"I realized something had to change. What I thought was gone was happening again. I had to nip it in the bud."

David signed up for and completed the 16-week JF&CS program. "Now, when something upsets me, a silent alarm goes off," he says. "I don't feel the need to yell or react." Since finishing the program, he has not had one of his old fits of rage. "I just don't get as angry as fast."

Looking back, David has learned well the program's central lesson: "I just didn't take responsibility for my actions."

There's the rub for program leader Bernie Finnigan, a veteran JF&CS social worker. The common thread among the dozen men in the workshop is not only their inability to manage their anger appropriately (and recognize its triggers), "but they don't accept responsibility for their actions. It's always someone else's fault."

Finnigan has also noticed something about men: Being angry is almost an entitlement. "Somehow, it's [seen as] part of being a man. It's about power and control."

The program is modelled on a similar, successful effort in Duluth, Minn., and draws a wide range of men, from their 20s, to their 60s. Not all are Jewish, but those who are represent the full spectrum of religious affiliation. Finnigan has noticed that shame is a big factor in Jewish men's contrition.

About half the participants are referred by the courts; they have to be there. The others, like David, have come voluntarily.

They meet at the Lipa Green building for two hours, once a week. They role-play, talk, watch films and keep an "anger log," as they are advised to do. They also bond, and learn from each other.

None of the men has committed a serious offence, such as causing bodily harm, but as first-time offenders, some are on the cusp. Finnigan has noticed two distinct types: those who "stuff," or internalize their feelings, and those who escalate, or make a mountain out of a molehill. The program sees more stuffers than escalators.

But what gets men so angry that they feel the need to lash out? Mainly, it's their perception that they're being nagged or deliberately provoked, or being forced to do something they feel is beneath them.

In David's case, partly, it was feelings of powerlessness, that he wasn't being listened to. The program "changed me. I got my last chance," he says, happily relaying the news that he and his wife are expecting their fourth child.

Another ancient Roman, Horace, warned that anger "is momentary madness; so control your passion, or it will control you."

JF&CS's next program begins in the fall.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

About six months ago, my mother fell and broke her hip. After spending about a month at a rehabilitation hospital, she is now at home and not doing very well. She is afraid of falling again and very anxious. In fact, she will not leave her apartment unless someone in the family accompanies her. We want to help her, but don't know how.

Feeling Helpless

Dear Feeling Helpless,

Your mother's loss of autonomy appears to be impacting on your entire family. I suggest you begin by calling your local social service agency and asking for an assessment of your mother's needs.

The social worker might recommend having your mother attend a day hospital program with a rehabilitation component. Day hospital rehabilitation services can help your mother physically and emotionally. She would learn the skills needed to regain her sense of independence, while boosting her confidence to manage on her own.

As for the family, you might consider a support group for family caregivers. It is often very comforting to be among other family caregivers who share feelings similar to yours.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse represents the management and staff of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

What are you laughing at?

A schnorrer once wangled his way in to see mighty Baron Rothschild by writing that he had a surefire way for the Baron to make half a million rubles.

"So, let's hear your great idea," the doubting Rothschild said.

"It's very simple and absolutely foolproof," answered the schnorrer. "Everyone knows that when you daughter gets married, you're going to give her a dowry of a million rubles."

"Nu, so what?"

"So, I'll marry her for half that amount!"

Special Report from the Stankovic refugee camp

SKOPJE, Macedonia — For Mentor Abdely, playing basketball is one of his greatest passions. Abdely, 22, and his friends play ball every day.

Dressed in black Adidas shorts and a white T-shirt, the sporty looking Abdely could be any sports fanatic anywhere.

But he's here. In the Stankovic refugee camp. And basketball is his only real refuge from the monotonous day-to-day life in the camp.

The makeshift basketball courts – nets set up on dusty and flat open areas – are filled with young kids and teens. Bright orange basketballs stir up dirt with every bounce. Balls fly in the air towards the nets.

But this isn't summer vacation. If this was a typical day, these kids would be in school. Abdely would be teaching in a high school in his native Preshova in Kosovo. The adult spectators would be working as doctors, shop owners and farmers.

Instead, the kids are playing ball. And the adults are milling around – often aimlessly.

"I love basketball, but I want to go home," said Abdely, who has been here for more than two months. "There's nothing to do here."

The Stankovic refugee camp, located 12 kilometres north of Skopje, is home to 25,000 ethnic Albanian refugees. The area is fenced in so that, as one official explained, the refugees – or more correctly, deportees – don't infiltrate the city.

Green and white tents are carefully organized in long straight rows. The tents, which look like they can fit six people comfortably, often shelter double that.

The tents are dark with a dank smell. Shoes line the outsides, and a water jug hangs by the opening of each tent.

Those residing here hope NATO's triumphant calls of peace will mean they can return to Kosovo soon.

Selim Halimi came to Stankovic four weeks ago. He and his family – 21 people in total – share two tents.

"I'd like to go back. I know my house is fire, but I like to go back," Halimi said in halting English.

Halimi talks about his family's harrowing journey in which they fled on foot from Pristina to Blaza, from where they took buses to Macedonia.

He knows that in a way he's lucky. He is here with his two brothers, their families, and his own

Canadian Jews reach out

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The national office of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada (JIAS) says it has been swamped with "literally hundreds" of letters, calls, faxes and e-mails offering support for Jewish Kosovar refugees, both those seeking shelter in Canada, and those who fled to neighboring European nations.

JIAS says the response from individual Jewish Canadians, synagogues and organizations has been "absolutely overwhelming." Adds the agency's national executive director, Michael Briks, "We should all be proud."

The agency has grouped the inquiries into three areas: those fearful for the welfare of Jewish Kosovars; family members seeking to be reunited with loved ones, as well as those interested in sponsoring refugees to come to Canada; and professionals and lay leaders seeking information on evacuation and resettlement activities.

According to JIAS, none of the ethnic Albanian Kosovars staying temporarily at Canadian installations have identified themselves as Jewish; however, the agency says that may change as the refugees grow more at ease, or wish spon-

Iran wants dialogue with Israel

The News in Brief

CANADA

Press Complaint Upheld

TORONTO — The Ontario Press Council has upheld part of a complaint that the Globe and Mail denied redress to the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) over a memorial notice.

The notice, placed as a classified ad, claimed Israeli soldiers "executed" the keeper of the Garden Tomb, the traditional burial place of Jesus, in Jerusalem in 1967. CJC claimed the ad was "untrue and potentially defamatory," and that its research showed there was no evidence the keeper of the tomb had been executed.

CJC told the council it would have been satisfied to have the Globe publish a retraction of the ad, or print its letter correcting the ad.

The council found no fault with the Globe for publishing the ad, noting it took CJC months to determine what happened in 1967 (Israeli soldiers believed they had come upon a pocket of resistance when they opened fire and killed the Tomb's keeper.)

But the council criticized the newspaper for telling CJC it did not publish letters to the editor commenting on classified ads, and for suggesting that Congress take out its own ad to correct the first one.

A letter challenging the content of the ad, if printed promptly, would have provided appropriate redress, the council found.

ISRAEL

General's Release

JERUSALEM — An Israeli general who has been in jail for an arms scandal involving the United States could be released later this month. An Israeli army spokesperson said that Rami Dotan, who has served nine years of a 13-year sentence for fraud, bribe-taking and breach of trust, would be freed on June 27 if no other Israeli authority blocks the decision. In 1997, Israel's High Court of Justice blocked Dotan's release. Dotan has returned more than $10 million to Israel's Defence Ministry.

New Ethiopian Efforts

JERUSALEM — Outgoing Israeli Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon has been appointed co-ordinator of Israel's efforts to bring some 3,000 Ethiopian Jews to the country. At a special meeting of ministers, Israel also decided to send food and medical aid to Jews in Ethiopia's Kwara region. Israel closed down its operations in Ethiopia last year.

Settlers Would Stay

JERUSALEM — Only 26 percent of Jewish settlers in the West Bank and Gaza Strip would be willing to move to communities inside Israel proper if peace is reached, according to a poll commissioned by Peace Now. Some 55 percent of the 414 settlers polled said they would not move even if offered money.

Palestinians Suspicious

JERUSALEM — Almost two-thirds of Palestinians are suspicious of Israeli Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak's intentions regarding the stalled peace process. Some 45 percent of the 1,320 people polled support armed attacks against Israel, down from 53 percent in January.

Swiss Funds In Israel

JERUSALEM — Needy Holocaust survivors living in Israel have begun filing claims for money from a $185 million Swiss fund created in 1997. Approximately 60,000 survivors are expected to receive $1,000 each from the fund.

WORLD

Chrétien Meets Wiesenthal

VIENNA — Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and famed Nazi-hunter Simon Wiesenthal last week condemned the atrocities NATO forces are unearthing in Kosovo.

Wiesenthal, 90, refused to compare events in Kosovo to the Holocaust, saying it was important to remember that the Balkans have a tradition of intercommunal warfare.

He also repeated his frequently stated criticism of Canada's record on Nazi war criminals.

Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said Chrétien joined a long list of European dignitaries who have honored Wiesenthal on his 90th birthday.

Urges Charges Dropped

PHILADELPHIA — A lawyer for a New Jersey rabbi charged with arranging the 1994 murder of his wife called last week for the dismissal of the charges against his client. The attorney for Rabbi Fred Neulander claims the local prosecutor's office leaked information last year from a grand jury investigating the case.

Axworthy Expresses Concern Over Iranian Jews

OTTAWA — Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy last week expressed his concern over the arrest of 13 Iranian Jews who have been charged with spying for Israel and the United States.

"Canada is disturbed by the arrests of Iranian Jews," said Axworthy. "I asked senior officials to call in the ambassador of the Islamic Republic of Iran for a meeting (which took place June 15) to underline Canada's concerns about the charges facing the accused, and to seek assurances regarding their well-being. I have asked Iran for further assurances that the judicial process will be fair and will conform to the norms of international human rights law."

Axworthy's office says Canada has taken a leading role in seeking the protection of religious minorities in Iran at the United Nations, within the UN Commission on Human Rights and through bilateral discussions with Iranian authorities.

Last weekend, the Canadian Embassy in Tehran sought clarification from the Iranian Foreign Ministry on the nature of the charges, and received assurances that the accused would receive fair treatment and due process in accordance with Iranian law.

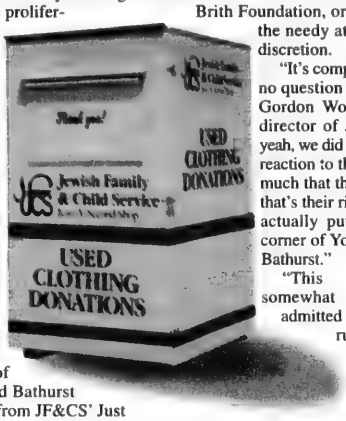
JF&CS, BBC square off over clothing boxes

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Among the many clothing drop-off boxes that have proliferated in the Toronto area in the past year, are three bright yellow installations along Bathurst Street.



The boxes represent an effort by Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) to take more aggressive action in collecting clothes to benefit needy people in the community.

Its effort is modest compared to that of B'nai Brith Canada (BBC), which has 29 clothing boxes, including one at the north-east corner of York Downs Avenue and Bathurst Street, just half a block from JF&CS' Just A Second store.

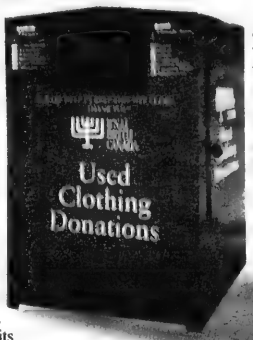
Clothing placed in the green BBC boxes is either sold to a Montreal-based business – Somodif, co-owned by Jack Kupfert, brother-in-law of BBC's executive director Frank Dimant – to raise funds for the B'nai Brith Foundation, or distributed to the needy at B'nai Brith's discretion.

"It's competition, there's no question about it," said Gordon Wolfe, executive director of JF&CS. "And yeah, we did have a negative reaction to the fact – not so much that they're doing it, that's their right – but to be actually putting it at the corner of York Downs and Bathurst."

"This has been somewhat contentious," admitted Wolfe. JF&CS runs Just A Second, a used clothing shop that has been in existence for over a dozen years – first on Bathurst near Ranee Avenue and now in the plaza at the south-east corner of Bathurst and York Downs – four doors south of the intersection.

Merchandise is sold from the store at reduced prices to the public, and provided free to clients of JF&CS and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, about 1,400 of whom use the store annually.

The store relies on donations from the community, which decreased by about 20 to 25 percent after the B'nai Brith boxes appeared. Donations subsequently increased once JF&CS began to seek them more actively, Wolfe said.



Partly because donations were affected, JF&CS recently put up its own clothing boxes to collect items for Just A Second. One is in front of the store, and the others are at the Bathurst Jewish Centre and Chabad Gate plaza.

The other reason for the boxes, said Wolfe, was feedback from donors who would like to drop off clothing at off hours.

B'nai Brith has given clothes from its boxes to JF&CS on at least one or two occasions.

Clothing donations have also been used for the Out of the Cold program and for victims of Hurricane Mitch, said Dimant.

The B'nai Brith Foundation funds Holocaust education, seniors' programs, humanitarian relief and B'nai Brith human rights programs.

Dimant insisted the box location near Just A Second had nothing to do with the proximity of the store, but was based on availability of parking spots along Bathurst Street.

Israel must be prepared for new wave of Soviets: Patt

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel must enlarge its economy to make room for a possible new wave of Russian immigrants, a former Israeli cabinet minister said recently.

Gideon Patt, the minister of construction and housing in Menachem Begin's first government in 1977, said that Israel may have to absorb upwards of one million Jews from the former Soviet Union.

Patt, currently president and chief executive officer of Israel Bonds, said that the former president of the Soviet Union, Mikhail Gorbachev, conveyed this information to him last November.

Once chair of the Knesset's economic affairs committee, Patt said that Israel has come a long way in developing its economy since statehood in 1948.

"I remember the times when we had almost nothing," he recalled at an Israel Bonds meeting at the newly opened Village Shul. "An egg a week. Meat we never saw."

Gideon Patt

Today, however, Israel has a vigorous and flourishing economy. Among 135 countries, Israel is in the top 23 in terms of development, according to the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund.

When a country is strong economically, it is strong socially and militarily, and can withstand external political pressure, he observed.

Patt, who served in the Knesset as a Likud party member until 1996, disclosed that Israel Bonds has sold $20 billion worth of bond certificates since its founding.

And in the past five to seven years, Israel Bonds sales have hit the $1 billion mark per year.

Citing his organization's tangible contributions to the Jewish state, he said that bonds revenues have helped Israel enormously in building a modern economy.

Even today, 45 percent of Israel's current development budget is derived from the sale of bonds, he said.

Almost 600,000 Jewish families world-wide own Israel Bonds, Patt revealed.

Israel Bonds, he added, cement Israel's partnership with the Diaspora.

JIAS Toronto planning to expand intergration program

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Not content just to sponsor Jewish immigrants and help them settle in, the Toronto branch of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada (JIAS) plans to continue, and even widen, its integration programming.

"It's not enough just to settle them. It's not enough just to have a roof over the heads," JIAS Toronto president Guidy Mamann told the agency's recent annual meeting. "We have to re-dedicate ourselves to providing [Jewish emigres] with a sense of belonging."

Mamann said JIAS's many integration programs will continue on two levels: introducing new arrivals to synagogues and communal organizations, and helping them celebrate Jewish holidays – all intended to strengthen Jewish identity.

The agency's programs include family life education, vocational and youth programming and events centred around Shabbat and major Jewish festivals. JIAS Toronto also offers English language training.

Its summer camp subsidy program has allowed 90 Jewish immigrant children to attend camp, Mamman said.

He reported that over the last fiscal year, the agency handed out some $550,000 in financial assistance.

Efforts to establish a cultural, educational and drop-in centre for Jewish newcomers at the Promenade Mall in Thornhill will continue, he added.

Drop-in centre

Over the last year, fewer Jewish families – but more individuals – came to Toronto under JIAS sponsorship than over the previous year.

The agency sponsored 570 families (compared to 636 the year before) and 1,450 individuals (compared to 1,384 over the previous 12 months) in 1998-99.

Again this past year, the majority (54.3 percent) of the community-sponsored immigrants came from Russia. The second largest group, 35.5 percent, arrived from Ukraine. Other countries of origin were Belarus, Moldova and the former Soviet Union's Asian and Baltic republics.

The agency's new executive director, Jack Kugelmass, was introduced. He was hired recently to replace Sharon Zeiler.

JIAS Toronto's annual Jack Shindman Scholarship Awards were presented by its namesake to three recipients: Alexander Estrin, a student who arrived two years ago from Belarus; Alina Shilo, a journalism student originally from Russia; and Michelle Yarin, who was born in Leningrad, and hopes to become a doctor.

The Readers Ask:

Earl Allan Dick

By:
EARL CRACKOWER
RICHARD ORVISS

Question: Why is there a limit of 20% foreign content in one's RRSP?

Answer: Well, the simple answer of course, is that our tax laws have this limit in place. Considering that the Canadian economy represents about 3% of the world equity markets, it would seem such a waste that our RRSP's cannot hold more foreign content in them. One might hope that in time, political logic would give way to investment logic.

In actual practice, however, there are various strategies that allow one to increase the foreign content in their investment portfolio. These range from purchasing bank-linked notes that link an investment with a foreign mutual fund, the use of derivatives to create a domestic fund with foreign content, and of course, to purchase domestic funds that invest up to the 20% limit in foreign equities. In fact, using this strategy has the impact of increasing your portfolio's foreign holdings to 36%.

Question: I have read that one can increase their foreign holdings in their RRSP by using "derivatives". Just what is a derivative, and isn't this a risky strategy?

Answer: Derivatives have no intrinsic value, much like common shares. They are simply paper assets that derive their value from another asset, known as the underlying instrument. Derivatives have many benefits. They can actually reduce risk when used for hedging purposes, are less expensive than direct foreign share purchases, and can be used to help offset market loses.

The most important benefit to Canadian investors is that derivatives allow exposure to global markets without counting against the 20% RRSP foreign content limit. This strategy not only increases the opportunities to invest outside of Canada, but also give us exposure to some of the top performing mutual funds, which previously could only be considered as foreign content.

We would be more than happy to discuss these and other strategies to maximize the foreign components of your investment portfolios with you. Please feel free to call Earl, Dick or Allan at: SB&C Financial Growth Associates, 272 Lawrence Avenue West, Suite 203, Toronto, Ontario. Telephone: 416-787-4517.

Family, friends praise Kelman for her dignity, graciousness

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ruth Kelman was praised by her husband, Rabbi Joseph Kelman, as the rebbitzen who could teach rebbitzens how to be rebbitzens.

Obituary

She also excelled as the mainstay of her family, communal worker, confidante, and adviser.

Her death from cancer on June 12, at the age of 65, brought forth an outpouring of grief from members of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation and other congregations, family and friends.

Kelman was born in Toronto, in 1933. She was an excellent student and a talented pianist. Her sister, Sheila Train, remembers friends coming over and being told to wait while she finished studying or practising.

When she was only 20, she gave up her potential career as a concert pianist to marry Rabbi Kelman and move with him to Sherbrooke, Que., and then to several posts in the United States.

In 1959, when Beth Emeth was "just a hole in the ground," as Rabbi Kelman described it, the family moved back to Toronto.

Ruth Kelman was active in the sisterhood and in the Women's League for Conservative Judaism, organizing programs and institutes, speaking and chairing committees.

She also taught those who wanted to increase their Jewish knowledge.

She went to Cheltenham Nursing Home, especially before the holidays, to play piano for the residents and to tell stories about the holidays. When she herself was hospitalized, she performed for the other patients on a keyboard her family brought her.

Ruth Kelman

When Rabbi Kelman founded Kadima, a school for the developmentally handicapped, his wife first became involved through her music. When the supervisor left, however, she took over, a responsibility she kept for some 25 years.

Her daughter, Tova Gutenberg, told The CJN that even during her mother's final illness, she was making sure that things at Kadima were running smoothly.

Among the first phone calls received after her death became known were some from dedicated Kadima students. Two of the students who came to the shivah sang a special song that Kelman had taught them.

Gutenberg noted that while her mother was known for her dignity and graciousness, she "didn't look for honor. She was always ready to unpack boxes at rummage sales, act as informal bridal consultant, and offer hospitality to family and friends."

A man at the shivah told a story about how Kelman had saved his life by contacting someone at the Mayo Clinic and arranging for him to go there for cancer treatment. She was so modest that she never told anyone about it, her husband said.

She had an eye for detail, Gutenberg said, as well as an eye for insincerity, which, she said, balanced her family's rather more trusting nature.

She was able to be close both to her own contemporaries and to her children's. "My friends used to come here and talk – they envied me my relationship with my mother," Gutenberg said.

At the shivah, Kelman was praised by a friend, who said the rebbitzen was the only person in the community who made her feel welcome when she was lonely after moving here from Winnipeg.

Most of all, she was devoted to her children and her husband. Although she was always busy, Gutenberg said, "she was always there for us."

She was a "bedrock" for her husband, said Gutenberg. "They were an amazing team."

Although she had been ill for about a year, she made a special effort last month to attend her grandson's bar mitzvah.

She died at home, on Shabbat, after saying a formal goodbye to her family.

Rabbis and members of the Jewish community of all ages and from every denomination came to the funeral and to the shivah home to pay their respects, and to relate how their lives were touched by her.

She is survived by her mother, Yetta Friedman; her husband; children Tova and her husband Allan Gutenberg, Rabbi Jay and his wife Ilana, and Rabbi Moshe; sister Sheila and her husband Dr. Louis Train; brother Avraham and his wife Bernice; and seven grandchildren, Pnina, Daniel, Joshua, Zahava, Ariel, Elisha, and Atara.

Canadian, Israeli courts said facing similar issues

By ANNA TURKIENICZ
Special to The CJN

From left: Stephen Adler, Elisheva Barak and Rick MacDowell.

TORONTO — Many disputes facing Israeli courts today are also being dealt with by their Canadian counterparts, says the president of the Israeli National Labor Court.

"Canadian and Israeli constitutional similarities create common issues and problems," said Justice Stephen Adler, speaking at a recent Canada-Israel seminar held at the faculty of law at the University of Toronto.

At the seminar, Israeli and Canadian labor law specialists discussed issues ranging from non-standard employment relations, and non-conventional strikes, to the constitutional aspects of labor law.

A recent Israeli Supreme Court decision determined that non-conventional strikes, or strikes for political purposes, are not deemed lawful and could, therefore, be limited, said Adler. The court felt that unions in key industries might use their striking powers to endanger the political process, he explained.

This decision overturned the Israeli Labor Court's ruling, which had been more lenient towards non-conventional strikes, he said.

University of Toronto law professor, Patrick Macklem, said these types of issues are also interesting for Canadians from labor law and constitutional perspectives.

"The fact that political strikes may be deemed illegal in Canada impacts on our constitutional freedoms. Basic freedoms, such as the freedom of expression and the freedom to assemble, are all affected by these types of decisions," he said.

We certainly can learn from the Israeli legal experience," Macklem said. "The nature of their limitations are more balanced than the blanket prohibitions we have in Canada.

"The history of unionism in Israel and the relationship between union, state and civil society are of interest for Canadians," he said. This is especially true in the current Canadian legal environment.

A recent Canadian example would be the Ontario teachers' strike, Macklem said. This was a non-conventional strike for political purposes, in response to the government's new policies, and it's just the kind of political unionism they have a great deal of experience with in Israel.

"We hope to have many more joint conferences between Israel and the faculty of law at the University of Toronto," said Ron Daniels, dean of the law school. "We clearly have a lot to learn from each other."

Other participants at the seminar included Justice Elisheva Barak from the Israeli National Labor Court; R.O. MacDowell, chair of the Ontario Labor Relations Board; and Prof. Harry Arthurs, president emeritus of York University.

Durham Reform congregation has hopes for its own building

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — B'nai Shalom V'Tikvah (Children of Peace and Hope), is the first Reform congregation in Durham, the region just east of Toronto.

Services are currently held in rented quarters in St. Paul's United Church in Ajax. But the dream of Harley Saltzman, B'nai Shalom's founding president, is for the congregation to have its own building.

"The church has bent over backwards to help us, stringing a cloth across their cross," he said.

As the population of Ajax, Pickering and Whitby – some of the main centres of Durham – has grown, so has the number of Jewish families in the region. It is estimated that in addition to the 50 family units in the congregation, there are at least another 50 who are unaffiliated.

Most of the shul's members live in Durham, but others come from Burlington, Toronto, York Region and Port Hope.

"The congregation is open to anyone who wants to join," said president Michael Chasler.

Before settling in the church five years ago, B'nai Shalom held services in a golf club, a public library and a community centre.

The shul is an outgrowth of a loose community group of 30 families called the Jewish Families of Durham Region.

Sunday school

A poll of its members revealed "an overwhelming desire" to become a Reform congregation, according to Saltzman, a Toronto accountant. Other founding members were Susan Bloom and Eli Edelson.

The need for a local children's religious education program was what motivated a group of Durham residents to establish B'nai Shalom, Saltzman said.

Rabbi Paul Golomb, executive director of the Canadian Council of Reform Judaism, leads the Sabbath services, as well as Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur services.

The Sunday school program, headed by Ron King, a teacher with 14 years experience at Holy Blossom Temple Religious School, operates in a Durham School Board building located next to the Pickering Go station. A total of 25 children attend classes in Hebrew and religious studies.

The congregation boasts 10 bnei and bnot mitzvah, so far, and there have been several baby-naming ceremonies. Sometimes tutors come from the synagogue in Oshawa.

With its own consecrated Jewish cemetery section in Durham Region, funerals and burials can also be arranged.

Other members of the executive include Saltzman, as treasurer; Peter Kerns, as religious chair; Roz Chasler, as communications director; Esther Jacobs, as fund raising chair; and Deborah MacKinnon, the ad hoc chair.

Stanching poison's invisible flow

NATO's campaign in the Balkans has now entered its second phase. The first phase was to create the conditions for peace in Kosovo. The 78 days of unceasing aerial bombardment achieved that. Finally, Yugoslavia's president Slobodan Milosevic could endure no more. Capitulating to the demands of the western alliance, he agreed that Yugoslav forces would withdraw from Kosovo, that a peacekeeping force under NATO auspices would supervise the peace in Kosovo and that Kosovar refugees would be able to return to their homes.

As of this writing, Serbian troops have completed their withdrawal from Kosovo; Kosovo rebels have reportedly laid down their arms, and Kosovar refugees are returning in droves to their former homes.

Now the second phase of the campaign, to enforce the terms of that peace, swings into play. Much like the first phase, however, it is fraught with risks and dangers.

Like an invisible wellspring, ethnic hatred is so deeply embedded in the culture and very bedrock of the area that it courses underground, nourishing the people of the region with water poisoned by enmity and distrust towards each other.

Each day, with Serbian forces rushing to complete their retreat back into Yugoslavia, new evidence has come to light confirming the west's worst nightmares about Milosevic's policies of ethnic cleansing: torture, brutality, mass graves, jail camps, rape and murder. Reuters News Service has reported rumors that the United Nations believes as many as 3,000 ethnic Albanian political prisoners have been secretly transported from Kosovo to Serbia to be used later as bargaining chips by the Yugoslav strongman, in a perverse game of negotiations.

As Albanian Kosovars return to their homes, Serbian Kosovars flee theirs. In somewhat of a reversal, NATO forces are now deployed to protect the few remaining ethnic Serbs in Kosovo from possible revenge attacks and reprisals by ethnic Albanians.

The cycle of strike, counterstrike, dispersal and looting continues. But this is precisely the cycle that must be broken if the Balkans are to be rebuilt into a freer, more stable, cluster of coexisting nations.

Breaking the cycle will be phase 3 of the campaign. But this phase will take a great deal longer to achieve than the two preceding ones. It will entail dismissing Slobodan Milosevic and his henchmen, encouraging strong democratic forces to emerge on all sides of the political-ethnic divides, and erecting interdependent, regional structures with closer economic ties underpinning them.

Europe has promised to provide Yugoslavia with more than $1.5 billion (US) over three years to reconstruct Kosovo. Additional funds will flow for humanitarian aid. But the money will not flow to Slobodan Milosevic.

Gunter Burghardt, the director-general for Europe's Balkan policy referred last week to Milosevic as a cancer. "We have to get rid of the source of the cancer that has been spreading throughout the region over the past eight years. That means we have to isolate Mr. Milosevic and put democratic institutions in his place," said Burghardt.

The NATO campaign against the ethnic cleansing practices of Slobodan Milosevic was just. So too is the campaign to restructure and rebuild Yugoslavia away from old hatreds and hostilities towards newer, more tolerant, inter-ethnic relationships. Bolder local leaders will have to emerge to try to stanch, if not alter, the flow of the poisonous underground spring.

We are glad that Canada has been and continues to be part of both campaigns.

Incorrect to assign collective guilt to Hungarians

Re: Letter to the Editor, "Anti-Semitism still alive and well In Hungary" (CJN, June 3).

To establish my credentials, let me tell a few things about myself. I was born in Hungary, in January 1930, in a medium-size town. Most of our family lived in the countryside. I experienced anti-Semitism from my early life. From age 12, during the bi-weekly, compulsory paramilitary "training," we had to wear yellow armbands, and we experienced physical and verbal abuses.

Most of our family was deported to Auschwitz and other camps where they were either killed immediately or during the following months. My father was killed in Buchenwald. In hiding at Budapest, we were captured, and taken to the Nazi party headquarters where we were badly beaten.

At the time of the liberation on Jan. 16, 1944, I was in a Swiss Red Cross-protected children's home and I was already very sick. I spent nearly the next five years in hospitals and sanatoria. All my life, my family and I have had to deal with the consequences of my health problems.

With my mother's seven and my father's three married siblings, once we had a large family in Hungary. Now, I have not even a distant relative. For this reason, I made only two trips back to Hungary. They were painful trips. I visited the cemeteries and the places where the family used to live. There were no family members or old time friends to visit.

As you see, I do not have much reason to have favorable prejudices towards the Hungarians.

Despite all of this, I cannot speak badly of the whole nation 55 or more years later, and I certainly cannot lump the entire new generation together with the murderers. I met good non-Jewish people even during the Holocaust. I met some who held out helping hands.

Because of my health, I started my university studies at the age of 22 and I was a university student at the start of the uprising. In a very small way, I helped to organize the students in my class. During the revolution, I was helping out at the Technical University's headquarters. Our commander was Lieut.-Col. Istvan Marian, a brave Jewish man. There were other Jewish officers and students at the university taking part in the uprising. Perhaps this was the reason that, at least in Budapest, there was very little overt anti-Semitism. I also heard about Itzig, Itzig; but despite the fact that I moved around town, I never saw the sign mentioned in the letter.

Jews were accused in Budapest and at other places of being members of the dreaded AVO (political police), abusing managers and communist leaders. As the days passed, atrocities were reported, mainly from the country, and our fears increased daily.

After the uprising, in the Camp Roeder refugee camp, near Salzburg in Austria, for safety reasons, we Jews had our separate barracks, and the Austrian gendarmerie kept a watchful eye for our safety. Some nights we were standing on guard.

There was a Hungarian speaking American Red Cross nurse, perhaps the daughter of an earlier DP, who posed the question in front of me: "What are the Jews doing here? They are not Hungarians!"

Despite everything, I feel that it is incorrect to judge a whole people and assign collective guilt. We Jews should know this better than anybody else. I am a volunteer at the Holocaust Memorial Centre, speaking to Jews and non-Jews. I tell them that there should not be any prejudice in people against each other. Just a few days ago, I was visiting a Roman Catholic secondary school and I thought that in the racially mixed group I got a good reception again. I think they understood the danger of prejudice, regardless of which side it is coming from.

Judaism teaches to eradicate child poverty

This morning, I enter a huge gymnasium inside a church where well over 100 interested individuals from diverse faith communities come together to share breakfast and open dialogue about the Campaign Against Child Poverty (CACP), established over a year ago.

I do not come representing any institution or organization; I bring no agenda with me. I come to listen and learn – to understand the issues, to find out what I can do to participate in this significant effort in this campaign for children.

June Callwood passionately expresses how vital it is that all kids have the opportunity to get the affection and stimulation they need and deserve. "Investing in our kids will solve a lot of society's problems," she reminds us.

This issue is just that complex – and just that simple. And we all must get plugged in! Working together creatively and collaboratively, we can make it happen.

Judaism teaches that apathy is foreign to our values. Judaism pushed us to have, create, and form opinions – to take responsibility by taking a stand and to get our voices heard. That is what the Jewish community is all about. Now I have no choice but to find some way to act to eradicate child poverty.

So now you know too! Now we must all find our unique way to participate in CACP. There is room and a place for all of us!

Perspectives

Chillul HaShem can take many forms

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

The Torah attributes to Jews a very strange power; it claims that we are able to make God's name holy or to desecrate it.

What does chillul HaShem mean? How could a Jew desecrate God's holy name?

A Jew who commits one of a number of grave transgressions listed in the Torah is said to desecrate God's name. Nachmanides, the great 13th-century rabbi, argues that the Torah labels some crimes as chillul HaShem simply as a way of emphasizing their seriousness (commentary to Leviticus 18:21).

Yet, there does seem to be a pattern that explains most of the cases that are labeled desecrations. The Torah says that swearing falsely by God's name is a chillul HaShem (Leviticus 19:12). When God's name is attached to a false oath, surely we understand that that constitutes desecration. A similar principle applies to cases where Jews are expected to do something in a holy manner – like worshipping God – and then fall terribly short of the mark. That is why it is a chillul HaShem when a Jew performs the temple service in some unbecoming manner (Leviticus 22:2), or when a parent offers a child sacrifice (Leviticus 18:21).

But the Bible suggests that a situation can entail chillul HaShem even when no sin is committed. The prophet Ezekiel interprets the fact that the Jews have been exiled from their land as chillul HaShem. Even though it is God who was the cause of the exile, still it is God's name that ends up being desecrated. "But when they came to the nations, they caused My Holy Name to be profaned, in that it was said of them, "These are the people of the Lord, yet they had to leave His land" (Ezekiel 36:20).

Whenever God's reputation is damaged, whenever people are brought to think badly of God, Judaism claims that a chillul HaShem has occurred. Amos (2:7) calls it a chillul HaShem when a Jewish man and his son frequent the same prostitute. Some classical rabbis argue that whenever any Jew commits any sin in public, that constitutes a chillul HaShem, for "others might see and conclude that that action is permitted" (Rashi to Sanhedrin 82a).

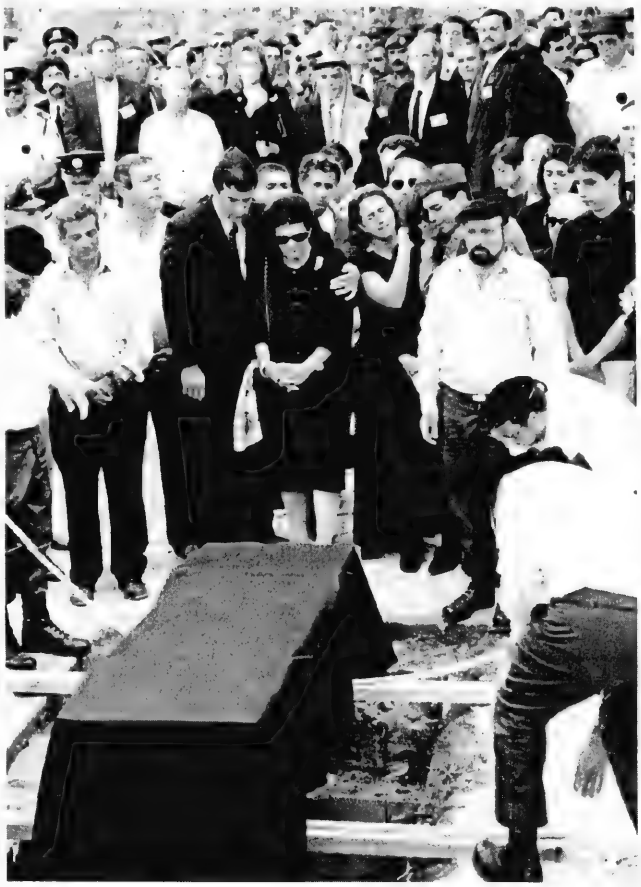
Some of the most interesting laws involve ways that a Torah scholar, a talmid chacham, is considered to be guilty of chillul HaShem. Maimonides teaches us that it is not only through sinning that a scholar might desecrate God's name. Even when he does something permissible, but something that is liable to raise eyebrows and lead to disgrace, a scholar is desecrating God's name. For example, when a scholar buys an item on credit when there is no need, Maimonides sees this as chillul HaShem (Yesode ha-torah 5:11).

A person, or at least a scholar, who wishes to refrain from desecrating God's name must go beyond the requirements of the law. Many classical Jewish texts assert that the opinions of the non-Jewish world are crucial when determining what constitutes chillul HaShem.

The biblical book of Joshua (chapter 9) tells the story of the Gibeonites, who under false pretences, tricked the Israelites into making a peace treaty with them. The classical rabbis explain that even though Jewish law would render such an agreement null and void, based as it was on deception, the Jews were required to honor their commitment, so as not to lead to chillul HaShem (Maimonides, Melakhim 6:5).

When non-Jews laugh at the way that Jews chat during synagogue services, that too is chillul HaShem. (Maimonides, responsa 256 and 258). One of the minor talmudic tractates (Kutim, chapter 1) teaches that if there is ever a situation where Jews consider a particular food kosher, while gentile society does not, it would be forbidden for Jews to purchase such food from non-Jews. It would be a chillul HaShem if people thought that Jews ate foods that gentile society considers disgusting.

In 1931, Rabbi Yehiel Yaakov Weinberg (Seride Esh 2:124) instructed the head of the Jewish burial society in Berlin that it would be a chillul HaShem if the Jews were to adopt a more lenient attitude towards cremation than that of the Christian German society.



Perhaps the greatest instance of Chillul HaShem in modern times was the assassination in 1995 of Israel's Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin by Yigal Amir.

In a passionate responsum (Choshen Mishpat 2:29), Rabbi Moshe Feinstein discusses the issue of accepting government funding for Jewish educational institutions. First he lashes out against people who "cook the books" to get more money from the government than the institution deserves by law.

But he goes even farther: even if one finds a government bureaucrat who might be sympathetic to the institution and might be willing to implement a regulation in a manner that would be advantageous to the institution but would be against the legislated law of the land, it would be chillul HaShem to ask the bureaucrat to do so, even if that furthered the cause of Jewish education.

Thus, some crimes in Judaism are considered even more serious because they entail chillul HaShem.

Other actions that might not be crimes at all, constitute chillul HaShem under certain circumstances. Jews who care about desecrating God's name must consider not only what Jewish law says, but also, how gentile society may relate to our behavior.

Even if the principles are clear, it may be difficult to apply the principles to a particular contemporary action. A famous example from history can be found in the uncompromising stance of Maimonides, who wrote that "anyone who decides to study Torah, to pursue no occupation, and to earn his living from charity, has desecrated God's name and scorned the Torah" (Talmud Torah 3:10).

While Maimonides and many other Sephardi authorities felt that way – that Torah scholars must pursue another way of making a living – other opinions also existed, including the opinion that sees a person "who decides to study Torah and pursue no occupation" as a pious man whose dedication to Torah in some sense saves Jews and Judaism.

Israeli yeshivot are filled with tens of thousands of students who subscribe to the latter approach; Israeli streets are filled with tens of thousands of people who see these perpetual students who pursue no livelihood as a terrible chillul HaShem.

There are some cases today that everyone knows constitute chillul HaShem: If a rabbi or cantor is accused of molestation; if an Israeli Knesset member, especially one who is also a rabbi, is found guilty of theft; or if an American rabbi is guilty of embezzlement or money laundering. Cases like that are obvious examples of chillul HaShem.

But let us consider a contemporary case that is harder to assess.

In a recent edition of the Jerusalem Post (April 16, 1999) an article by a well known "centrist" Orthodox rabbi analyzed recent developments in Israeli secular society and in the Reform and Conservative movements.

The author was particularly enraged by a recently published Reform educational kit for use in seventh grade classes, which described Abraham's actions in Genesis 22 ("the Binding of Isaac") as an act of abuse. Based on this and other evidence, the author of the article drew some startling (and to my mind offensive) conclusions about Israeli secularists and about Reform and Conservative Jews, arguing that they are all modern-day Hellenists.

These groups, he argued, are all attracted to each other because for all of them it is "the fashion du jour of the world around them" and not Jewish values that determines their thinking.

I am convinced that almost any knowledgeable Jew who reads that article would see a chillul HaShem in it. The problem is that different Jews will see different aspects of the article as chillul HaShem. Some would probably see a chillul HaShem in the Reform movement allowing the publication of a teachers' guide that maligns Abraham, our forefather. Others might conclude that it is a chillul HaShem that a rabbi (ironically a "centrist" Orthodox one, who does not eschew modernity or institutions such as universities) would write an article in the Jerusalem Post labeling Reform Jews and Conservative Jews and secular Israeli Jews as Hellenistic and assimilatory. And perhaps there are (in fact, I hope there are) some Jews who would see chillul HaShem on both grounds.

What can we learn from the idea of chillul HaShem?

Jews ought to act based on what they see as Jewishly right, but ought also to refrain from doing something that they consider proper if it might cause shame to Judaism. But there are reasons to be concerned that chillul HaShem will become more and more of a problem.

Charles Liebman of Bar Ilan University recently described (in Secularism, Sprituality and the Future of American Jewry) a change in the way that Jews think of themselves. What he calls an "ethnic" type of identification with Judaism "has given way to a form of privatized religion...[which] speaks in softer terms of individual meaning, journeys of discovery, spirituality and the search for fulfilment."

Jews who see their Judaism in these terms are rarely concerned about how their behavior will affect the way that the rest of the group is seen. They value authenticity over group reputation.

Let us hope that Jews continue to remember the idea of our group reputation, and of God's reputation. Let us hope that Jews use the idea of chillul HaShem, not as a way of pummeling competing Jewish ideologies but as a way of leading more introspective Jewish lives.

Martin Lockshin is the associate director of the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University.

Opinions

Isolated and ostracized

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The more I read about the tragedy in Littleton, Colo., the more I am reminded of a period in my life. There was a time during my days in high school when I dreaded the moment I had to face my classmates and teachers. There were years when I was isolated, made fun of and otherwise abused mentally, though not physically.

This happened during the 1920s, the days of the Weimer Republic. The locus was a school in the working class district of North Berlin, where I and 34 other students were subjected to the teacning methods of the German school system.

I was, by far, the youngest student, and when my schoolmates – overwhelmingly gentile with a small sprinkling of Jewish boys – reached the age of puberty, I was still living in the land of childish innocence.

It was an all-male school, which was the custom in Berlin. I think the majority of the boys during this crucial time were between 13 and 15 years of age, but I was still an 11-year-old trying to cope with life's vagaries. The other boys shared their sexual fantasies, and from time to time, one of the teachers chimed in with clever double entendres, which, apparently, everyone except me understood and greeted with raucous laughter. During those jolly moments, I felt that all eyes were directed at me, and I was deeply embarrassed by my incomprehension. The teacher was no help – quite the contrary.

It got worse from day to day. I knew it had to do with the physical structure and propensities of men and women, and I sought refuge in books. Alas, they disclosed nothing of value to me in this respect, and I remained an innocent abroad looking for answers I could not get. It did not occur to me to ask my parents, and if I had asked them I am quite sure I would have been turned aside.

I began to hate going to school. Several times I feigned illness, but that ceased to work after a while. Though I continued to be a good student, I hated every moment I spent in an environment that isolated and ostracized me. The fact that I was Jewish did not help either.

A big, burly boy whose first name was Fritz, became my worst tormentor, and one day in the late 1920s, when the Nazi party was beginning its spectacular ascendancy, he sported a swastika in his lapel.

Then one day he taunted me with some anti-Semitic blabber, and in so doing, drove me to reckless action. I hit my giant neighbor in the face, and that one blow happened to knock him out. He fell to the floor with a loud thud, banging his head and prolonging the period during which he was unconscious, raising in me a sudden fear of having killed a human being, however hateful he might be. But he came to, and never taunted me again, and neither did anyone else.

I learned that bullets persecute the weak, and that persecution, ostracism and isolation can cause terrible pain.

The above does not try to explain what happened in Littleton, but it did light up a dark corner in my youthful life. Fortunately, I was not left with any permanent damage, and as for my neighbor Fritz, I have no idea what happened to him and don't particularly want to know either.

What is a Jewish journalist?

Jennifer Fox in Thornhill

I recently attended the first annual Canadian Jewish student journalism conference, which was held in Toronto. The mission of the event, which was hosted by Afterword: Canada's Jewish Student Newspaper, was to bring the future Jewish journalists of Canada together to meet and network with Jewish journalists who have managed to find their niche in the business.

Over the course of the three days, 30 students sat like sponges, and absorbed all the wisdom these professionals were willing to share.

Do not panic, you will find a job, said one member of the National Post's under-30 set.

Sell yourself, sell yourself, sell yourself. If you want that full-time, part-time or internship position, you have to let the editors and producers know you exist.

Think of it as stalking, but in a good way. Instead of getting slapped with a restraining order, you'll get slapped on the back for a job well done.

Of course, if you are too persistent, you might end up with that restraining order after all.

Then, there is the great debate about whether to attend a journalism program (j-school) or opt for the well-rounded path of the liberal arts degree.

Often, editors proclaim they won't hire anyone from a j-school, scaring students senseless. I however, think there is a happy medium. The key to success is to actually pay attention during all the electives you have to take.

This explains why King's College makes the foundation year program (a combination of various courses from the liberal arts) mandatory for its first-year j-students.

The advice at the conference was good and did not go unheard. I listened to what all the more than 20 speakers had to say, and came away with an understanding of the industry and a mind-numbing fear for my future.

Be assertive? Have four more story ideas in reserve in case the first one's a flop? Don't bother with a journalism program? This did not sound like me. While many of my peers nodded their heads in agreement, I had serious doubts about a career in news media.

After the doubts, came another terrifying thought. Welcome to the rest of your life as someone else. If I wanted to be a reporter as planned, I would have to give up being me.

While I was mentally hyperventilating, another theme appeared at the conference. What is the difference between a Jewish journalist and a journalist who is Jewish?

One speaker said we would have to decide between the two. Another sat down in the small conference room in the B'nai Brith building and said it wasn't an issue: A journalist is a journalist is a journalist. Then you're a Jew.

His point wasn't that religion should be shoved aside to advance one's career, but that a journalist finds the story and tells the story regardless of religion, race or gender.

Impartiality doesn't really exist. Everyone has opinions and bias; the goal is to not let them dictate what you write.

I've always assumed that as a Jew, I would be unable to report on the events in the Middle East. I would be too biased. Israel would always be right and everyone else would always be wrong.

Jerusalem, it was pointed out at the conference, is the world capital with the most journalists after Washington, D.C. and London, England. At least a handful of them have to be Jews.

And if I can be a Jewish journalist (or a journalist who is Jewish, depending on your preference) who reports on Israel, then why can't I be both an employed reporter and remain myself?

Why should my job change who I am? It is the rest of my life – byline or not.

Why aren't people like their pets

Erica Horn in Montreal

Our dog's name is Truman. Twice a day, he goes to the dog run, where he has a lot of friends. Roxy and Buster are part of the morning crowd, while Kaya, Hogan and Princess play with him in the late afternoon.

Everywhere I go and there are dogs, there is an owner who knows of Truman. Having a dog has exposed me to a whole new world comprised of friendly people possessing a wealth of knowledge concerning a dog's life and the doggie world. Did you know there were such things as dog sushi and doggie ice cream? Pet spas and day cares are a booming industry, and grooming costs more than the average human haircut.

Some people treat their dogs like people, or simply wish their dogs had human-like characteristics. For example, I spend an extraordinary amount of time talking to Truman in the hope that he'll understand me. My youngest brother dreams of the day when Truman will speak English to him, and my mother – she spoils him as though he were her fourth child (actually we all kind of do).

Needless to say, we do not take criticism of Truman very well, nor do we tolerate dogs that try to bully Truman and act all macho in the dog run. Moreover, we tried to find him kosher dog food so that he would truly feel a part of the family. Other people slightly more obsessed and definitely more loony may even set a place for their dog at the dinner table or feed them filet mignon every night for supper.

The saying that a dog is a man's best friend holds much truth. What is interesting, however, is that people are preoccupied with training their dogs to be model citizens and teaching them proper dog etiquette (i.e. biting visitors won't result in a liver treat; nor will chewing up old photo albums). However, people never seem to step back and evaluate what it is they can learn from their dog.

Truman has a lot of friends, both humans and dogs. The people who meet him think he's handsome, and he thanks them for the compliment with a little lick. The dogs that meet him tend to enjoy playing with him. Together they run and fetch balls. Admittedly, sometimes he has difficulty sharing. Day after day, when one of us takes out the leash to take him for a walk, he gets excited, because he knows he is going to see his friends. Why aren't people like that?

Always around this time of year, as I pack my duffel bags for camp, I start to appreciate my friends more. During the year, we are all busy with different activities and the odd outing all together becomes less and less frequent. I find my friends making up excuses for the reasons they are unable to attend birthday celebrations, and when we do see each other, half of us are late to arrive (running on Jewish time) and the other half need to leave early because of work the next morning. It is only in June, when we know we must part ways, when I head south of the border and most of them head further north, that we start to make an increased effort to see each other and truly enjoy each other's company.

If there is one thing I have learned over the past four years, through CEGEP and university, is that without friends to trust, to share with, to laugh with and to cry with, life would be very lonely and boring. It seems as though Truman has discovered the true value of friends ahead of many of us. When he is with his friends, he seems to cherish every moment, for there is not one instant where he is roaming by himself, sulking, pouting or running away from them.

We should stop being so self-absorbed and start to look at other people and creatures as role models for some of our own behaviors.

The Kirshner File

War in Yugoslavia mercifully ends

I heaved a sigh of relief when the news came through that the war in Yugoslavia had finally ended. All wars are nasty and brutish, but this one was particularly nauseating, having been spawned by chauvinism and racism, reactionary forces which have all too often demeaned and decimated minorities, including Jews, in this bloody century.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The latest conflagration in the Balkans – a notoriously unstable region which sparked two Balkan wars and World War I – really began in 1989 when Yugoslavia was still a united federal republic. Pandering to Serbian nationalism to amass yet more power, Yugoslavian strongman Slobodan Milosevic revoked the autonomous status of Kosovo, a province predominantly populated by ethnic Albanian Muslims.

The result could have been foretold. Yugoslavia, a multinational land which had been held together tenuously by Tito, was irretrievably destabilized by Milosevic's malicious manoeuvre. The subsequent wars of secession in Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia and Macedonia destroyed the old Yugoslavia and ushered in a horrific era of ethnic cleansing practised with brutal efficiency by all sides.

Kosovo, abutting Albania, was initially spared the calamities which engulfed Yugoslavia as it broke apart at the seams from 1991 onward. But given Milosevic's brutality toward the Kosovars, it was only a matter of time before Kosovo was sucked into the deadly maelstrom. How, reasonably, could he expect the Kosovars to turn the other cheek in the face of repression? How could he go on mistreating them without an appropriate Western reaction?

At the Rambouillet peace talks last winter, NATO tried without success to resolve the gnawing problem diplomatically. Milosevic was uncompromising, refusing to grant the Kosovars the autonomy he had unjustifiably yanked away from them.

NATO issued ultimatums, but to no avail. Milosevic was unyielding, knowing full well that his rump Yugoslavian state would be bombed if he persisted in his stubbornness.

On March 24, NATO unleashed a bombing campaign aimed at military targets, electrical power plants, oil refineries, bridges, roads and, ultimately, Yugoslavia's major cities – Belgrade, Novi Sad and Nis.

When NATO suspended its aerial attacks, in response to Milosevic's belated acceptance of its terms to end the war, 1,200 innocent civilians had been killed by errant "collateral" fire and Yugoslavia had been left in ruins. It will take hundreds of billions of dollars and years to repair the damage.

The Serb leadership in Belgrade is responsible for this cataclysm. In the waning months of the millennium, the Serbs callously set out to depopulate Kosovo of its Muslim inhabitants. They did so in a concerted campaign of terror, rape, looting, burning and killing. Milosevic and company, who already have been indicted for war crimes by the United Nations tribunal in The Hague, succeeded in systematically expelling 850,000 Kosovars from their homes and in displacing a further 500,000 inside Kosovo.

And it has not gone unnoticed that the Serbs stripped the fleeing Kosovar refugees of their identity cards to ensure that they would never return. By all accounts, the Serbian army, police and paramilitary burned 500 of their villages.

The Serbs disingenuously claim that NATO bombing runs prompted the mass exodus. But this seems to be at odds with reality. It appears that the plan to expel the Kosovars was drawn up before March 24. The Serbs intended to change the ethnic composition of Kosovo, an insidious policy which violates all norms of civilized behavior. In terms of intent and ferocity, Kosovo can thus be compared with Rwanda.

Some Western leaders, such as British Prime Minister Tony Blair, claim that the atrocities in Kosovo are comparable to those perpetrated during the Holocaust. Drawing "powerful parallels" between Milosevic's ethnic cleansing and Nazi Germany's crimes against humanity, Blair said that the world was witnessing "the most evil form of racial genocide since Hitler." Milosevic, he argued, wanted "to wipe a people from the face of his country."

Milosevic, certainly, is a vicious brute whose stock-in-trade is ethnic cleansing. But to compare him to Hitler, as Blair does, is to misinterpret history and diminish the Holocaust.

Milosevic's henchmen killed several thousand Kosovars, burying them in mass graves. But it was never his intention to exterminate the Kosovars in the manner Hitler sought the wholesale destruction of Jews. Depopulation, not extermination, was Milosevic's grand objective. We should be absolutely clear about this, lest invidious comparisons be made about the Holocaust, a unique event in history.

If the Serbian government is guilty of war crimes, is NATO criminally liable for wreaking widespread death and desolation on Yugoslavia? NATO couched the bombardment in moral terms. Its spokesmen claimed that it was a crusade to restore and defend the rights of the Kosovars. If so, in light of the mass murders of the past century which culminated with the massacre of the Armenians and the slaughter of the Jews, this was a principle well worth defending.

NATO, too, could not be faulted for seeking to staunch the spread of chaos beyond Yugoslavia's borders. Europe, with two wars behind it since 1914, is understandably weary and wary of armed conflicts which remorselessly devour lives and property.

But, as Canada's former ambassador to Yugoslavia observed in a trenchant commentary recently, NATO's bombardment was "a blatant violation of every precept of international law." NATO, wrote James Bissett, violated the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, signed in Helsinki in 1975.

This solemn document reaffirmed respect for the inviolability of frontiers, the peaceful settlement of disputes, non-intervention in internal affairs, and the avoidance of the threat or use of force. And NATO, he correctly noted, violated its own charter, which calls for settling "any international dispute... by peaceful means..."

Clearly, the use of force to settle a crisis is fraught with grave uncertainties and pitfalls. Who knows where the bombs will fall next?

I recognize that Milosevic's ethnic cleansing was intolerable and could not be allowed to stand. And I realize that Milosevic pushed NATO over the edge. But what a dangerous precedent the western alliance has established by bombing Yugoslavia to its knees.

Slobodan Milosevic

One last point.

Drawing on still-fresh memories of the Holocaust, numerous Jewish organizations expressed support for the bombing. But history is fickle. During World War II, as University of Toronto historian Michael Marrus reminded me, the Serbians courageously resisted the Nazis and their local collaborators, and roughly 17 percent of the Serbs lost their lives.

Yet Yugoslavian Jews found no solace in the wartime Serbian government of Gen. Milan Nedic, who was backed up by a pro-Nazi militia and who, at best, turned a blind eye to their suffering.

This murky picture is further muddied by the fact that some Yugoslavian Muslims participated in barbaric anti-Jewish violence and joined the German army in droves (while others helped Jews).

In the Balkans, the canvas is smeared in shades of gray. And so was the Yugoslavian war which has just mercifully wound down.

The Jews of Iran

By AVI BENLOLO

The recent arrest of 13 Jews in Iran has reverberated throughout international Jewish communities, Israel and world political circles. Although suspicions began brewing as early as April, Iranian radio has now confirmed the arrests.

Iran claims that the 13 Jews charged are Zionist spies on behalf of Israel and the United States. Both countries have released official statements attesting that this assertion is false and without merit.

This situation is clearly embedded in the history of the Jews of Iran and Iran's relationship with Israel and the United States. The historical roots of Jews in Iran, or Persia as it was formerly called, date back to the sixth century BCE, the time of the First Temple.

The invasion of the Muslims in 642 CE ended Jewish independence in Persia and installed Islam as the state religion. This inevitably had an impact on the sociopolitical atmosphere of the country, thereby changing Jewish life dramatically.

Following centuries of intermittent persecution, relief for the Jews came in 1925 under the Pahlevi Dynasty. When Riza Khan Pahlevi became shah, he secularized the country, orienting it towards the west and permitting Jews to fully participate in the country's economic and cultural life.

Ayatollah Khomeni's 1979 Islamic Revolution, however, introduced an era of Islamic fundamentalism, thereby creating an insecure environment for the country's 80,000 Jews. Thousands fled in the wake of the upheaval, leaving behind vast amounts of wealth and property, and hundreds of years of history.

There is no consensus as to how many Jews remain in Iran today. Estimates range from 12,500 to 30,000 Jews living predominantly in Tehran and Shiraz. They live, however, in a paradoxical state: On one hand, they are free to be Jewish and practise religion. On the other hand, they are not permitted any demonstration of Zionism or support for the State of Israel.

Apparently, the Jewish community does enjoy a measure of religious freedom, but it is faced with constant suspicion. Iranian Jews are unable to emigrate to or visit Israel directly. If at all permitted, they must do so via a third country. They further run the risk of being placed under immediate surveillance if they apply for a passport to travel abroad.

Their restrictive environment would seem to be contradicted by the fact that the Iranian government reserves a seat in parliament for a Jew who represents his community. The current representative, Manouchehr Eliasi, did recently call for true justice following the arrest of the 13 suspects.

Still, there are three synagogues in Tehran that function on a regular basis. There are also approximately the same number of schools where Jewish pupils constitute the majority. However, the curriculum is Islamic, and while the Bible is taught, it is taught in Persian, not Hebrew.

Iran's vehement opposition to the existence of the State of Israel began following the 1979 revolution. Iran has since backed terrorist groups like Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad. It has further been suspected by Argentinian authorities of having played a role in the 1994 bombing of the Argentine Jewish Mutual Aid Association.

The recent election of President Mohammed Khatami, a self-professed moderate, has led many to believe that Iran may be entering a new era. Unfortunately, the baseless arrest of 13 Iranian Jews demonstrates that Iran must yet reach a state of political and social normalization in which human rights and freedoms are valued and respected.

The power of e-mail lists

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

One of the most powerful areas of the Internet doesn't use fancy multi-media presentations, stunning graphics, real-time audio or even pictures.

Just words.

Through e-mail lists, you can find people anywhere who share an interest in your occupation (or preoccupation), no matter how specialized or idiosyncratic. And if you can't manage to find a list that suits your needs, you can always create one.

Here are just a few examples of lists available: Do you want to give your kids a quality Jewish education at home? Talk to others who are doing the same [http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Agora/7633/JewishHomeSchoolers.html].

Are you a descendant of Spanish and Portuguese Jews who were forced to convert under duress? You're not alone [http://members.tripod.com/~anak/anusim.htm]. Or would you like a synopsis of the Torah reading mailed to you weekly? No problem [http://www.ohr.org.il/web/sub.htm].

Actually, your letter is a piece of e-mail, and it isn't addressed to anyone in particular but to a "list." A list is simply a record of people from around the world who share a common interest. When a message is posted to a list, everyone who has joined automatically gets a copy of that letter.

Unlike conventional letters you get in the mail, this electronic exchange of correspondence is immediate and free. When you join an e-mail list, you have an opportunity to build a true sense of community, even if that community stretches around the world and is made up of members who will probably never meet in person.

There are several different kinds of lists you can join. Some are "moderated." That means that one person acts as a kind of gatekeeper to ensure that all messages sent in are appropriate before they are mailed out to the subscribers.

Other lists are "unmoderated." As soon as you send in a message, it is immediately sent out to everyone on the list. Unmoderated lists can be quite wild, because there is no quality control.

When lists are "restricted," a manager must approve your membership: for example, on a list that deals with delicate issues like abuse.

Finally, there are some lists that don't solicit public input. These lists can be compared to a column in a newspaper or newsletter to which people subscribe in order to receive essays from a respected writer.

Many sites are making it very easy to "subscribe" and "unsubscribe" to lists. However, there are several other commands you can use to customize your mail. For example, some lists will allow you to receive one daily "digest" of mail rather than dozens of individual messages. And another command will even let you find out who else is subscribing to the list.

You'll find a detailed discussion of those commands at [http://www.webcom.com/impulse/list.html] and a simplified one at [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/lists/what.htm].

Now that you know the e-mail basics, where should you start? With a little Torah, of course. Lists are a wonderful way to learn about Judaism on a regular basis. And Eric Simon has done an incredible job of gathering information about dozens of Jewish lists onto one page [http://shamash.org/reform/uahc/torahnet/]. Some examples: Project Genesis' Halashon looks at the ethics of speech. The Jewish Theological Seminary of America offers e-mail classes on Women in Rabbinic Literature. And there's Rav Zelig Pliskin's Daily Lift. If you subscribe to Rabbi Pliskin's list on spiritual and emotional growth, you can "start your day the Pliskin way. It has twice the impact of coffee – and no caffeine."

Next week, a look at what Virtual Jerusalem, Shamash and Project Genesis have to offer. And I'll tell you how you can participate in e-mail lists, even if you don't have your own Internet account.

Roots & Remembrance

Together again for the first time

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Toronto legal secretary Debbie Klavir-Donda and her aunt Shelagh Klavir, a travel agent, are preparing to welcome about 100 relatives to a family reunion next month at a resort in Huntsville, Ont.

With the exception of their own small family circle in Toronto, all of the various Klavir relatives are flying in for the reunion – a word that Debbie admits she is using very loosely, since these family members have never been united before, and she has never met any of them.

They are coming from Argentina, Brazil, Hawaii, Israel, Ireland, the Netherlands, Luxembourg, and all across the United States.

One of their relatives from Holland and his fiancée from Australia plan to be married at the reunion. The couple, whom Shelagh describes as "baal tshuvah Lubavitchers," are bringing their rabbi to Huntsville to conduct the ceremony.

Less than two years ago, Shelagh and Debbie knew of only a handful of cousins. Then, in October 1997, an Israeli genealogist named Meyer Denn contacted them seeking Klavers – alternately spelled Klawir and Klavier, among other variants. The name has even been anglicized as Glover.

Did their family come from Lublin, Denn asked? Debbie and Shelagh responded that the family had come from Warsaw, and had immigrated to Ireland.

"Ireland was evidently the magic word that allowed Meyer Denn to make an instant connection," Shelagh recalls. "He had traced the family back to about 1750, to a couple named Moishe and Itty Klaver in Lublin. They had 14 children, three of whom immigrated to Ireland with their families."

The name Klaver, incidentally, came from the piano-like instrument because some ancestors manufactured pianos in the 18th century. Debbie, intrigued by the stories she was learning about her roots, established a family newsletter, named Klaver Notes with the musical motif in mind.

She also volunteered to organize the first Klaver family reunion.

"I'm the sole organizer of this thing," she says. "The logistics of it all were overwhelming at first. We're expecting about 100 people and I've never met one of them. I have written to, corresponded with, and spoken to all of them over the past year."

It was only about five weeks ago that her Dutch cousin announced that he and his fiancée would like to be married at the reunion. One doesn't have to be a genealogist to understand how irresistible such an idea could be. What better occasion to wed than at a large family gathering honoring a lineage going back 250 years?

Now Debbie is gladly helping to organize the wedding as a central event within the four-day reunion. "It's a glatt kosher wedding," she says. "I've had to find someone to provide glatt kosher sushi for 90 people."

Meyer Denn, the Israeli genealogist, is one of several family researchers who is hoping to make new discoveries at the reunion.

Debbie, however, intends to concentrate on the logistics of welcoming 100 relatives from all around the world. She plans to leave the genealogical research to the aficionados, who have uncovered an ancestral link to a family named Fernand, which may have been Sephardi.

A bus is scheduled to carry participants from Toronto to the Grandview Resort in Huntsville early in the afternoon of Friday, July 23.

Despite the many demanding organizational challenges, Debbie seems as upbeat and excited as Shelagh is about the upcoming reunion. "This has brought such richness into our lives," says Shelagh. "I can't tell you what it's done for us."

Soon they will put faces to the names, and give ear and voice, alternately, to the family stories that have been waiting for just such an occasion to emerge. For most participants a reunion like this, involving long-separated branches of a family tree, can only be an intensely interesting and dramatic event, with many unseen, and perhaps even mystical overtones and consequences.

Gender stereotypes

Fighting to Become Americans: Jews, Gender and the Anxiety of Assimilation*, by Riv-Ellen Prell (Oxford Press, $45.95).

Books
Bernard Baskin

This provocative study is concerned with how American society over the past century created vicious stereotypes of Jewish women – immigrant "ghetto girl," demanding mother and Jewish American Princess (JAP). The author maintains that as Jews were portrayed as marginal, materialistic, uncivil and poor citizens, many Jewish middle class men projected those very accusations onto Jewish women.

The hardworking "ghetto girl," the child of immigrants, was depicted in the Jewish press as cheap in her choice of dress and jewelry, shrill of voice and shallow and vain in her behavior.

But for the author, "the real contorted exaggeration was in the work of those who circulated the representation.The frantic, panicked rendering of young Jewish womanhood was created by Jews who felt threatened by non-Jews."

The stereotype of the Jewish mother/wife, drawn largely from Jewish comedy and popular literature of the 1950s and '60s, depicted her as suffocating her family with food and nurturance, as highly manipulative, as demanding impossible total loyalty, and as naive or hopelessly out of touch with the world of her children.

"An army of Jewish comics – Myron Cohen, Milton Berle, Shecky Green, Henny Youngman, and Alan King – joked about their wives' demands for the houses, appliances, trips, and clothes that were impoverishing their husbands."

The author, once again, insists that these comic portrayals appeared in tandem with widespread anxiety that beset upwardly mobile suburban Jews. Even after they had achieved middle class status, the problem of true integration with non-Jewish society was not achieved. "Gender stereotype re-emphasized the fact that Jews continued to be one another's mirrors for the pain of their difference from the nation."

Who is the Jewish American Princess? Supposedly, she is a young Jewish girl or woman who is spoiled, self-serving, materialistic, aggressive, sexually repressed, whining, castrating, parasitic, manipulative, demanding, venal and lazy. She is a "golddigger" who preys first on her father's fortune and then on her husband's. In some people's minds, she does nothing more all day than kvetch, file her nails, and go shopping for bargains.

The notion of the Jewish American Princess was popularized by movies like Marjorie Morningstar, The Heartbreak Kid, Goodbye Columbus, and Private Benjamin. The central characters of these movies are young, pampered, materialistic and romantically involved Jewish women. Comics like Joan Rivers, Mel Brooks and Rodney Dangerfield exploited the JAP stereotype for their comedy routines.

When JAP jokes are picked up by those who are bigoted, vicious anti-Jewish behavior can result. JAP jokes are the seeds for classic prejudice.

There is another problem with JAP jokes. Jewish men are turned off romantically from marrying Jewish women. In The Heartbreak Kid, Jeanne Berlin plays a spoiled, whining, Jewish bride on her honeymoon. Her Jewish husband soon finds her totally repulsive, as she chews with her mouth open. She drives him into the arms of a gorgeous blonde Aryan from Minnesota.

It is the author's reiterated thesis that whenever Jews looked into the harsh images held up by the dominant culture, they reacted in frightened and ambiguous terms and tended to blame their women.

Riv-Ellen Prell is a University Professor and Fighting to Become Americans is scholarly in style and presentation.

Star Wars' Jewish references

By DAVE GORDON

The film, Star Wars, has received a great deal of attention. It has been studied and dissected by many film buffs, but few have noted the similarities between Judaism and Star Wars. Yet I believe there is evidence to prove that the film, in many cases, alludes to Judaism.

Guest Voices

A long, long time ago, in a galaxy far, far away... In the first few minutes of the original Star Wars (1977), C-3PO and R2D2 are wandering aimlessly through the desert of Tatooine. C-3PO laments, with seemingly Jewish guilt, "We seem to be made to suffer. That's our lot in life."

They are soon caught by little brown-cloaked creatures called Jawas. Could this be George Lucas' subtle attempt at attributing God-like characteristics to the creatures, giving them a name that resembles the Tetragrammaton. You can't see their faces, and they drive a large, monolithic vehicle that contains parts of robots to be put together to create new robots.

Upon meeting these Jawas, C-3PO exclaims to R2D2, "Thank the maker!" Little did he know that they would capture him and sell him into slavery – a reverse irony.

Luke Skywalker buys the droids, and via R2D2, he intercepts a holographic message from Princess Leia that was intended for Ben Kenobi.

Kenobi, the prophet-like character in Star Wars, meets with Luke to receive the message. In the process, Kenobi explains to Luke meaning of The Force: "The Force is an energy field created by all living things. It surrounds us, it binds the galaxy together, it penetrates us."

Does this sound a little like you-know-Who? Here is the concept of universal balance, the similarity between The Force and the Jewish God, both the communal consciousness and the mastermind physical force that links and binds all of nature together, the order within the would-be chaos of the universe.

Additionally, who else would God be speaking through, other than a prophet-like character? How else could one explain a prophet who has supernatural powers? Note that the Hebrew word k'navi, which means prophet-like, sounds similar to the name Kenobi.

But this is not the only Hebrew reference in Star Wars. The name Jedi is close to the Hebrew yad-die, meaning "a hand is enough," and refers to how the weapon of the Jedi, a lightsabre, is used. It might also refer to The Empire Strikes Back, in which Luke loses his right hand.

Another understanding of the word can come from the self-defence art form, karate. In Japanese, kara-te means "empty-handed," referring to those who are forced to defend themselves without a weapon in their hands. To a Jedi, perhaps a hand is sufficient.

Many of the other names in Star Wars also echo Hebrew words. Yoda, the "all-knowing" character, reflects the Hebrew yodaya, which means knowing.

Vader is a bit trickier. The Hebrew word va-taer means to give up. We know that Darth Vader "gave up" the good to join the Dark Side.

The name Chewbacca resembles ts'va-chah, meaning to scream or growl.

In the new movie, we meet Shmi Skywalker, Anakin's (Darth Vader before he was Darth Vader) mother. Shmi in Hebrew means "My name is..." I'm not yet sure of the significance of this connection.

Not only are there Hebrew connections in Star Wars, but faith and religion are discussed a number of times. For example, the commander of the Death Star taunts Darth Vader after they have lost some vital information: "Your sad devotion to that ancient religion has not helped you conjure up the stolen data tape."

"I find your lack of faith disturbing," Vader responds.

Even Han Solo complains: "I've never seen anything to make me believe there's one all-powerful force controlling everything."

Part of this summer's fun will be to decipher the Jewish allusions George Lucas has placed in Star Wars Part I: The Phantom Menace.

BBC clothing boxes used as fundraising venture

He did not consider moving the box, as requested by JF&CS.

Instead, he suggested that Just A Second be a beneficiary of the B'nai Brith box, an offer that was refused.

"The clothes we would get," said Wolfe, "would be, in many cases, not suitable for resale and not of any significant amount."

Dimant, in a separate interview, maintained the B'nai Brith clothes would be pre-sorted for quality, and his organization would do "only what is very helpful to" JF&CS.

"Truthfully, had [JF&CS] had a box out there, then probably – not probably, a hundred percent – we would not have put a site [at Bathurst and York Downs]," said Dimant.

Would B'nai Brith reconsider its Bathurst/York Downs site now that JF&CS has its own boxes?

"Are they willing to remove all their other boxes so that they're not in direct competition? Sure. We'd consider it. [But] why is there a question of removal?" Dimant asked. "We want to work jointly with them."

Both B'nai Brith fundraising and JF&CS' provision of clothing to needy people are "legitimate and worthwhile [goals], but they're different," said Wolfe.

Dimant doesn't dispute Wolfe's statement that BBC's major reason for collecting clothes is as a fundraising venture.

"It's certainly a very important component, yes, considering we don't get UJA dollars," Dimant told The CJN.

He maintains it is "common practice" at UJA agencies such as JF&CS and Le Mercaz, the Montreal counterpart of Just A Second, to sell clothing for profit.

Donations to Just A Second that are "not of sufficient quality," or that haven't sold and are occupying space needed for new stock, are sold by the bag to a local used clothing store, confirmed Barbara Barak, JF&CS' co-ordinator of volunteer services.

"Otherwise, we would have no way of removing the items from the store," she said. The money is used for store operating expenses, she noted, and any money left over is used to send needy children to camp.

Barak said she doesn't know how much money is made from the sale of surplus merchandise. "The money goes into the till and becomes part of the overall sales for the store. There isn't a great deal."

Similarly, Le Mercaz sells its surplus – outdated or threadbare items – to Somodif, according to Hinda Bilenco, its co-ordinator of operations. The money – over $10,000 a year – is used to benefit clients of Jewish Family Services.

The proportion of clothing that B'nai Brith sells, compared to what it donates, varies, said Dimant. "If, like for Hurricane Mitch, there's a need for a trailer-load of clothing, we would give whatever clothing we have available."

Surplus sold

By the end of 1998, the B'nai Brith Foundation had netted $20,000 from the boxes. B'nai Brith receives "prime rate – plus" for the clothing it sells, said Dimant.

There is nothing explicit on the B'nai Brith boxes, nor in their earlier ads, to indicate what is done with the clothes, some of which are recycled or sold in countries around the world.

The clothing box initiative was suggested to Dimant by Kupfert, whose company supplies the boxes and serves as intermediary for the clothing.

"We said fine, as long as we could maintain control and give all the clothes we want to community volunteer programs," Dimant said.

In the June/July bulletin of Beth Tikvah Synagogue, there is a notice specifying that clothes from the BBC box at the synagogue are distributed to the homeless or sold in bulk to acquire revenue to support B'nai Brith programs.

But the notice also asks Beth Tikvah members who want to ensure that their clothes benefit needy people in the Jewish community, to donate them to Just A Second.

Anna VanDelman, Beth Tikvah's social action committee co-chair, placed the notice after a synagogue member, who is affiliated with JF&CS, mentioned to her that donations to Just A Second had decreased because of the B'nai Brith boxes.

Although VanDelman donates her own used clothes to Just A Second, because the store can use plus-size items, she was "absolutely thrilled" when the BBC box was put up.

At the time, the committee had 19 bags of clothes that had been donated to the Out of the Cold program, but nobody wanted them, according to VanDelman.

"I don't care what B'nai Brith does with the clothes," she said. "If they're selling the clothes and taking kids to a baseball game, that's okay with me. Anything that helps anybody is okay with our committee."

"We seem to be getting a lot of gratitude for the convenience of our boxes," said Lou Ronson, chair of the B'nai Brith Foundation. "There are a lot of closets full of stuff that people want to get rid of."

According to research done by Goodwill – a registered charity that sells donated goods in its stores to fund training and employment services – convenience is the number 1 motivation for people to donate, said Jill Kehoe, director of communications for Goodwill Toronto.

"The other important factor is what's happening to their goods," she said.

"The value of used goods has escalated over the past few years, and we now have for-profit enterprises coming into the marketplace. We want to make sure the donor is comfortable.

"We encourage people to ask questions before they donate," she said.

The selling of donated clothes by charitable organizations to private companies is "a fairly new phenomenon that's been imported from the United States," said Patrick Johnston, president and CEO of the Canadian Centre for Philanthropy.

"There's nothing wrong with that, as long as the donor understands it's almost in lieu of a cash donation."

Dr. Ruth wants women to enjoy their pregnancies

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dr. Ruth Westheimer is too busy to live in the past, but the world-famous sex therapist – a mother of two and grandmother of three – has fond memories of her pregnancies.

"I walked around like the happiest person in the world, with my hands on my belly all the time," she recalled last week, sipping a cup of cinnamon stick tea at the Crowne Plaza Hotel. At 4 feet 7 inches tall, she was as wide as she was high, she noted.

Speaking more seriously, she recalled feeling tremendous satisfaction and a sense of triumph over Hitler. The only survivor of her family, she was sent at age 10 from her Orthodox home in Frankfurt to a Swiss orphanage to escape Nazi Germany.

These days Dr. Ruth – the name by which she is instantly recognized – is hoping her new book will help other women enjoy their pregnancies.

Westheimer, 71, was in town last week for the Canadian Booksellers Association trade show – and to visit her son, daughter-in-law and their 1-year-old daughter, who are living here temporarily.

The book, Dr. Ruth's Pregnancy Guide for Couples (Routledge, $22.00), is Westheimer's 17th. Her co-author, Amos Grünebaum, is an Israeli-born professor of clinical obstetrics and gynecology at Columbia University College of Physicians and Surgeons.

"It was a very difficult birth, this book," said Westheimer. "[Almost] every time we were sitting together, his beeper went off, and he was called to deliver another baby."

While there are many books on pregnancy, Westheimer says there is a dearth of information on sex during pregnancy.

Her book is aimed at filling that gap, right down to an illustration of the "Dr. Ruth and Dr. Amos position" dreamed up by the authors for expectant couples.

But the book is much more comprehensive, as its surtitle (Love, Sex and Medical Facts) indicates. Medical and emotional aspects of a couple's life from before conception to after birth are discussed thoroughly but readably.

"There are many women and men who are very worried about engaging in sexual activity during [pregnancy]," said Westheimer.

Dr. Ruth Westheimer [Frances Kraft photo]

Women worry about inducing premature labor; men believe they're being selfish and worry about hurting the baby, she said.

Once women get the go-ahead from their doctors for sexual activity during pregnancy, Westheimer feels the book can help them enjoy the time. "Make sure that you make the best of it," she admonishes.

She is very happy that the book has been published in paperback, making it accessible to more people. "It's not an expensive book. I want people to have it, to read it, and to have good sex."

A 13th century quotation by Rabbi Isaac ben Joseph of Corbeil at the beginning of the book – reading in part "...even when his wife is pregnant it is a mitzvah to bring her joy in this manner if he feels she is desirous" – pleases Westheimer no end, she said.

She attributes her ease in discussing sexual matters to her traditional Jewish background. "For us Jews, sex was never a sin. Sex is a mitzvah, an obligation."

All her books – among them Sex for Dummies, Grandparenthood and Heavenly Sex, a book about sex in the Jewish tradition – include quotes from Jewish sources.

Why? "Because I'm very Jewish," she said simply. "I believe we have such a wealth of wisdom from the sages."

Although she hasn't read the widely publicized book Kosher Sex, by Rabbi Shmuley Boteach, she said if it helps anyone have a better relationship, then by all means they should use it.

Among Westheimer's Jewish involvements is her longtime presidency of the YMHA of Washington Heights near her Manhattan home.

"I've never missed a board meeting," she said.

She has lectured extensively in Israel, where she once served in the Haganah. During the Gulf War, she travelled there to show her support.

She still goes annually, and recently taped an Israeli version of Hollywood Squares.

Her daily attire includes a necklace fashioned by Jerusalem goldsmith Michael Ende to resemble the Kotel, and bearing a Hebrew inscription on the back wishing her 121 years of life.

Westheimer savors life. She exudes energy and cheerfulness, with her brisk way of speaking, ready smile and girlish giggle.

An avid downhill skier, she still lectures occasionally at New York University, maintains her sexual therapy practice, and has three more books in the works.

She confessed to not being computer literate yet, although her new book lists Web sites as resources, and Westheimer herself – who got her media start 19 years ago on radio – answers questions on the Internet.

She speaks dotingly of her grandchildren – her daughter's children Ari and Leora, as well as baby Michal – whom she sees regularly.

It's very important for her to be busy, especially being a widow for the past two years, she said.

Recently, Westheimer began dating. "Other people who are alone should know they have to take that step into making new relationships. I certainly believe people need companionship and friendship."

Unlike some celebrities, she loves being recognized. "It's nice to be Dr. Ruth," she said.

JF&CS Diamond Centre marks 25th anniversary

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — What began as a mobile outreach program in a trailer in Yorkville during the hippie heyday became a unique adolescent treatment centre.

This project, which was spearheaded by Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), is now known as the Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre. Three decades later, it stands as Canada's only facility for troubled Jewish youth.

The centre took its modern form 25 years ago – a fact that was highlighted at JF&CS's recent annual meeting.

Tributes to the Diamond Centre and to JF&CS came from several speakers, including Jerome Diamond himself. The former executive director of JF&CS lauded the agency for coming a long way since the early days, when Torontonians, as he recalled, "were careful not to offend each other."

In 1968, the Diamond Centre began as a mobile treatment unit providing outreach in Yorkville to Jewish street kids.

A few years later, it moved to two buildings on Keewatin Avenue in north Toronto, and became a residential placement centre for troubled youth.

In 1974, the two locations became Centre Shelanu, a residential and day treatment centre for Jewish adolescents. It was renamed after Diamond in 1980.

Over the years, as many as 600 troubled Jewish youth passed through the facility, both in its day program, which offers classes and skills training, and in its kosher residence, which was staffed 24 hours a day.

Budget cuts forced the residence to close in 1995.

Among the centre's former residents was Jeremy Gold, who came to the facility in 1988 as an angry and confused 14-year-old. Now a poised, articulate young man, he praised the Diamond Centre for turning him around, as he told the annual meeting, "like an old, beat-up classic car that has been restored."

Last year was a busy one for JF&CS. The agency handled 3,760 calls, provided counselling services to over 7,000 people, distributed $1.4 million in assistance to over 2,500 children and adults, and investigated over 400 allegations of child abuse.

It ended its fiscal year with a balanced bottom line.

Last winter, JF&CS responded to Jewish homelessness. It hired a consultant, Lillian Freedman, to find homeless Jews and recommend a course of action.

The agency says it "assisted over 100 transitional homeless persons" with financial and housing assistance.

Its intake and after-hours emergency staff were made more aware of homelessness, and JF&CS established accounts with inexpensive hotels for emergency placements, it says.

Richard Cummings, who has served as president of JF&CS for the past two years, passed the leadership to Susan Maldoff.

Completing their terms on the board of directors were Al Dickstein, Robert Furman, Janice Langer and Leonard Wechsler.

Welcomed as new board members were Steve Benmor, Marvin Gans, Karine Krieger, Richard Orzy and Lori Shekter-Wolfson.

JF&CS's new president, Susan Maldoff, takes the gavel from outgoing president Richard Cummings at the agency's recent annual meeting.

Tribute was also paid to staff on completion of 25 years of service, and to Florence Weinberger, who managed the agency's communications department for 11 years. Weinberger heads to York University, where she will be development officer for women's and Jewish studies.

Or Haemet Sephardic School gets new president

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — How does someone with an eastern European surname end up as president of Or Haemet Sephardic School?

"That's one of the beautiful things about Toronto. There's such a wonderful mix of ethnic backgrounds," says Marvin Igelman, 36, who took over the position from Jacques Benquesus early last month.

Igelman's own background is more heavily Sephardi than his name would indicate. His mother Gladys (née Cohen) traces her family history in Morocco at least half a dozen generations back.

Marvin's father David was born and raised in Tangiers. David's parents – Marvin's paternal grandparents – left Poland in the late 1920s for Spain. They settled in Morocco, where the political situation was more stable and there was an established Jewish community.

"You'd be hard pressed to say he wasn't [Moroccan] many generations back," Marvin said of his father in a recent interview. Marvin's paternal grandmother has "a wonderful Yiddish-Spanish accent," he noted.

Marvin Igelman

Marvin's parents immigrated to Canada separately in the late 1950s and were married here.

Marvin, whose wife Luna was born in Morocco and raised here, practised law for eight years before launching his own internet software company, Warp 10 Technologies Inc., in 1995.

Three of their four children attend Or Haemet (the youngest is a preschooler). Marvin has been a member of the board since 1994 and also serves on the executive of the Sephardic Kehila Centre, the Thornhill synagogue that houses the school.

He was also involved in the founding of Medrash Torah Vehayim and served on the board of Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla Congregation.

In the general community, he has been involved in fundraising for the likes of UJA Federation and Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

He feels it's important to "help establish a very strong presence of the Sephardi community in the general community."

In his capacity at the day school, Igelman oversees the board of directors and is responsible for a number of administrative functions.

He touts the school's small classes and quality of education, but what he says is "really incredible" about Or Haemet is its family atmosphere.

"People who know the Sephardic community know that it's very family-oriented. The school is almost an extension of the family," he said.

His goals include continuing to strengthen the relationship between the Sephardi community and the larger Jewish community.

School has about 220 students

"I don't think people can consider themselves well-rounded Jews without understanding that their heritage includes both a Sephardic and an Ashkenazic component."

Or Haemet has about 220 students from junior kindergarten through Grade 8, including a small number of Ashkenazi background.

Igelman himself is not an alumnus, as the two decade-old school was not around when he was a child.

A graduate of Eitz Chaim Day School, he attended the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto for two years before switching to Sir Sandford Fleming Secondary School (now Sir Sandford Fleming Academy).

His generation is very fortunate, he believes. "We're not isolated [Jewishly]. We're truly part of the larger Jewish community. This goes back almost to the days of the tribes, where we all carried our own flags but we were all part of the same nation and larger camp."

CORRECTION

In the article on UIA Federations Canada's Galilee Fellowships (On Campus, Nov. 17), there was an error in the fourth paragraph. The sentence should have read: "Scholars will have a chance to interact with their colleagues." The CJN regrets the error.

Jewish artist creates glass cross for the Pope

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

MARKHAM — Judd Shemesh smiles and shrugs when it's pointed out that he – a Jewish, Iraqi-born, British-educated, Israeli-raised artist – has created a stunning glass cross to be presented to Pope John Paul when the leader of the world's Roman Catholics visits the Palestinian Authority later this year.

"To me, art is for everyone," says the Thornhill-based glass sculptor. "It's for all people, of all religions."

Shemesh, 58, may be blasé about the multicultural significance of his latest creation, but he's excited that it will be presented to the pontiff on John Paul's historic visit to Bethlehem this December to mark Christian millennial celebrations.

The 18-inch high, 5-pound glass cross was commissioned by the Roman Catholic archdiocese of Miami, where Shemesh's work is well known. The archbishop of Miami plans to present it to the Pope at a huge New Year's Eve mass in Bethlehem.

How does a Jewish artist who specializes in glass chanukiyot, menorahs, Shabbat candelabras and mezuzah covers come to design and build a cross for the Pope?

Four years ago, a customer walked into his studio in Florida, where Shemesh winters. The customer, a Catholic, was intrigued that Shemesh was experimenting with a cross. He put the artist in touch with the Archbishop of Miami, who bought the cross.

The archbishop's office then asked Shemesh to design and make a gift for the Pope to mark the millennium.

Shemesh began doodling and then made a cardboard model. It took nine months to finish the work, made of six separate, beveled glass pieces that were fused with a special glue that reacts to ultra-violet light to form a seamless bond.

The image of a crucified Jesus appears to be floating inside the free-standing cross, but is actually etched on the reverse and painted gold.

Shemesh is unperturbed that a Jew raised in Israel has built a cross for the Pope.

"Religions are very close to one another," he told The CJN from his combination home/studio/showroom. "I strongly believe in God, but I'm not religious. I see myself as a spiritual person."

The Baghdad-born artist was taken to Israel at age seven, and studied business in England. He came to Canada in 1972 and began modeling for Simpson's and Eaton's catalogues.

Shemesh, who has been an artist for only five years, has had other major accomplishments.

His work was recognized when the head of the American Jewish Congress visited the White House in 1997 and presented U.S. President Bill Clinton with a Shemesh-made chanukiah – two glass triangles positioned to form a Star of David.

With no formal training, Shemesh hit the library to learn all he could about glass art. His mother and brother are clothes designers, and his sister sculpts and paints. "So I guess it's in my genes," he muses.

Now, he has pieces in New York's Museum of Modern Art and the National Glass Museum in Waterloo.

His mainstays are candle holders with straight, clean lines. He uses commercial glass, and then sandblasts, carves, polishes and paints to create the unique products. He markets his work under the name Glassique, available in fine giftware and Judaica shops.

"I was always fascinated by glass," he says. "It's the only creation of God that time cannot affect. If you come back in 1,000 years, it will be the same."

Rabbi explores nature of wealth and religion

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There is evidence in Jewish liturgy and tradition that money is needed in today's world, but a belief in God will help direct the use of wealth and ensure a good night's sleep.

This was the message of Rabbi Dr. Eugene Borowitz, a philosopher who spoke recently at Temple Sinai. The lecture was sponsored by the Dennis Waldman Foundation.

"The Holocaust destroyed any connection between poverty and religiosity," said Rabbi Borowitz, a professor at Hebrew Union College Jewish Institute of Religion, which is located in New York City.

"The Talmud decries the negative effects of poverty. In short, making money is a valid mitzvah. There is no other way for Jews to survive."

Rabbi Michael Dolgin described Rabbi Borowitz "as the foremost theologian of our (Reform) movement." The professor, who has written 322 books, has just co-authored The Jewish Moral Virtues, his latest published book.

An excerpt from this book from the chapter on wealth was distributed to those in attendance before the lecture. In it, he quotes from a writer who said, "wealth is a greater test of character than poverty," and another writer who said that anyone whose outhouse wasn't far from his table was a wealthy man.

Rabbi Borowitz said he was concerned over the "silence" about personal ethics. "The problem of the evil urge in each of us will remain real."

Give Tzedakah

He said he was attracted to a 14th century Jewish Italian philosopher who wrote a book on 24 Jewish virtues. "He was realistic enough to combine high idealism with practical convictions and he had the courage to include a chapter on wealth.

"He said having money can be a religiously significant virtue, but at the time he wrote it, he believed all Jews believed in God."

Mainstream Judaism does not define poverty as a virtue, Rabbi Borowitz said. "Throughout our history most Jews have lived in grinding poverty. Neediness does not increase religiosity. Our sages teach that the risk of wealth is less destructive to Jews than the risk of poverty."

Pointing to the need to give tzedakah wisely, he added: "Studies have confirmed that the truly affluent usually give modestly. They want their net worth to remain stable."

Before his lecture, Rabbi Borowitz paid tribute to Rabbi Jordan Pearlson, senior rabbi at Temple Sinai.

BOUJADI MOROCCAN RESTAURANT

The wonderfully exotic flavours and fragrances of Moroccan cuisine are exquisitely presented at Boujadi, where meals are meant to be savoured slowly, mouthful by mouthful. To that end, dishes are prepared fresh from scratch; they may take a little longer to arrive at your table, but the sensuous dining experience that results is well worth the wait. Portions are large, prices reasonable.

Highly recommended is the Marhaba, a large platter including many popular Moroccan features such as couscous, vegetables, merguez, kafta, olive/lemon chicken and stuffed phylo pastry. A delectable variety of vegetarian dishes is offered as well.

Also noteworthy is the genuine warmth and hospitality of owner/chef Charles Obadia and his staff. A pleasurable visit, in every respect.

Israeli astronaut has feet planted on earth

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Col. Ilan Ramon has heard of the movie, The Right Stuff, but he hasn't gotten around to viewing it yet.

He's seen Apollo 13 and one or two science fiction films about the final frontier, something about shuttle pilots destroying asteroids or some such thing but he can't quite remember their names.

For a man scheduled to take his own trip into outer space, Ramon still has his feet planted firmly on the ground. As Israel's first-ever astronaut, he's more concerned about engineering systems and science experiments than about the wild black yonder.

Ramon, 45, was in Toronto last week as a guest of State of Israel Bonds to speak to a select group of investors. He also addressed the Beth Tzedec Congregation during Shabbat services. Following his two-day visit, he returned to Houston where he continued his training in preparation for his role as payload specialist on board NASA's space shuttle.

Although he's still waiting to hear when he'll be blasting off, Ramon and his Israeli backup, Yitzhak Mayo, maintain a busy schedule of training exercises.

Astronauts lucky enough to fly on the shuttle fall into three categories, Ramon explained: pilots, mission specialists and payload specialists. Even though he's an accomplished fighter pilot, Ramon will serve as a payload specialist, running an Israeli-designed experiment that will study the dissipation of dust particles in the earth's atmosphere.

Not quite the sort of mission one would normally expect from someone with "the right stuff," nevertheless, riding on board the shuttle as it's propelled beyond the earth's gravity by giant rockets firing in a controlled explosion, is not exactly a walk in the park.

Still, danger is nothing new to Ramon. Although he won't give full details of his military career, this much he'll say. He was born in Tel Aviv, and raised in Ramat Gan and Beersheva. He joined the Israeli Air Force in 1972 and received his pilot's wings two years later. He's flown A-4 Skyhawks, the Mirage III, Phantom F-4s and, since 1980, the F-16 Falcon.

Ramon won't say what sort of missions he's flown, but he had enough Israeli Air Force (IAF) right stuff to be given command of an F-16 squadron. His last military post was as head of weapons system development and acquisition for the air force – a post he was planning to hold for 3½ years before retiring.

But towards the end of 1995, wheels were turning in diplomatic circles that were to change his plans.

Shuttle missions

Not long after Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated, his successor, Shimon Peres, met with U.S. President Bill Clinton. Together, they agreed that Israel would participate in future NASA shuttle missions.

It took two years for tangible steps to result from that meeting. The IAF was asked to select candidates for the job, and they searched for someone with a technical education – Ramon had received a degree in electrical engineering from the University of Tel Aviv in 1987 – and who was good at working in a team.

Late one night when he was about to go home, Ramon received a telephone call from the Air Force's human resources department. "It was really like a joke," he recalled. They asked him to consider serving as Israel's first astronaut. He couldn't believe his ears.

Although the offer was vague and there was no set time frame, the phone call was certainly no joke.

But after talking it over with his wife, Rone, he agreed.

In April 1998, Ramon and Mayo, a navigator and weapons system operator in an F-16 test squadron, flew to Houston for physical and psychological checks. They – and the Israeli experiment – were subsequently approved by NASA, and last July they began their training.

Col. Ilan Ramon

Most payload specialists learn very little about the shuttle systems themselves, but Israel negotiated a unique arrangement that would permit Ramon and Mayo to train in all aspects of shuttle operations.

"We train and observe as much as we can, just to study and to learn," Ramon said. "We're interested in all [aspects of] the space program."

The shuttle is a rocket and a plane, so its system aerodynamics are similar to an aircraft, he said. On the other hand, it's such a complicated piece of machinery, it takes more than one year to learn the basic shuttle systems, compared to two or three weeks for a fighter aircraft, he said.

NASA pilots, who must all be U.S. citizens, are curious about his IAF experience, which he shares with them, minus the operational details, he said.

"They are very good people, very talented people. They are the right stuff," he said.

On the other hand, having trained with NASA's best, "the IAF has nothing to be ashamed of. The IAF people are at the same level as the astronauts," he said.

Israelis, like people in much the rest of the world, are intrigued by space and his selection to join NASA's team was front page news in the Jewish state.

Ramon expects it to become an even bigger deal after his flight. Like Jeffrey Hoffman, the U.S.-born Jewish astronaut who took a Chanukah sevivon (spinning top) on board, Ramon plans to add an element of Judaica to his flight, though he's not yet ready to announce what it will be.

"We're keeping it as a surprise," he said.

But one thing he will say. He and Mayo believe they're representing more than just the State of Israel.

"We'll try to transfer to space the unity of the Jewish people, from Israel and the rest of the world," he said. "We represent the entire Jewish people."

Polish-Jewish relations

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Holocaust is a distorting prism through which to view Polish-Jewish relations, said Gershon Hundert, a professor in the McGill University department of history.

"It is a fundamental distortion of the experience of Jews in Poland to say that anti-Semitism in Poles came with their mother's milk," Hundert said.

His talk, titled Poland, Paradise for Jews?, the Louis Lenkinski Memorial Lecture, was given at the Workmen's Circle and sponsored by the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada.

Lenkinski was one of the founders and a former chair of the foundation's Toronto branch. Hundert is also a founding member of the Toronto branch.

His thesis, that the true nature of Polish-Jewish relations is shown in earlier times, was challenged by an audience member, a survivor, who said that Hundert failed to explain why there is so much antipathy to Jews in present day Poland.

"When we needed help, it didn't come," the survivor said. "I have revisited Poland three or four times, and on the last visit, I was told not to go to the provinces without a police escort."

Hundert said he did not deny the survivor's personal experience, but contended that it was a combination of nationalism, anti-Semitic views of the Catholic church and economic rivalries that led to the breakdown of Polish-Jewish relations.

He said he is anxious to correct "an imbalanced picture"of Polish anti-Semitism.

"The use of the word minority [to describe] Jews is a distortion and misleading, as half of the urban Polish population was Jewish, while 90 percent of the total population was in the countryside."

UCC student wins stock market contest

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A little instinct and a lot of homework paid off for Jay Mintz, 17, who won $500 in this year's Wilfrid Laurier University National Secondary School Stock Market competition.

The Grade 11 student at Upper Canada College (UCC) parlayed a theoretical $100,000 investment on the Toronto Stock Exchange (TSE) into $126,380 over 12 weeks. He won the contest's Huntly McKay award, recognizing the highest return with the most diverse portfolio.

Jay Mintz

The contest was part of Mintz' Computer Business Applications course, but he's been following the market since receiving five stocks as a Chanukah present in 1996.

During the contest, he spent up to an hour a night studying the TSE Web site and the Toronto Star business section, for which his mother, Judy Nyman, used to be a columnist. She now runs her own business, Nyman Ink, an information design firm.

Among Mintz' best picks was the Loewen Group Inc., which operates funeral homes and cemeteries. "It had gone way down, then way up again, and way down," said Mintz. He guessed – correctly – that the trend would continue.

"Sometimes I was a little surprised how fast some of the stocks would go up or down," he said.

Mintz selected Gentra Inc. on the basis of a news release he spotted on the TSE Web site. The development company had just signed a major real estate deal.

His personal portfolio hasn't done nearly as well as his virtual one, Mintz said ruefully.

"I learned quite a bit. Most importantly, we learned not only how to read the tables, but about the different types of trading. We learned a lot about how the market works and what to look for."

Although he hasn't made a final decision, Mintz would like to pursue a career in business, perhaps as a stockbroker or – like his father Harley – an accountant.

"I've always been better at math and economics than English and history," he said.

For market novices, he would advise, "Make sure you have a lot of research on the company. Don't jump into anything."

Aside from investing, Mintz enjoys movies, television, hanging around with friends and playing soccer on the UCC team – an activity for which he has also won an award.

"Soccer and the stock market are both fast-paced," he noted. "You have to always be aware of what's going on. Anything can happen."

sorship by the community should they decide to remain in Canada.

"We've made known our intention to help Jews stay," says Briks. "We're confident that as people identify themselves as Jewish, we'll be notified."

Overseas, meantime, four Jewish families who fled the bombing have expressed interest in coming to Canada. Two of the families are currently in Budapest, one is in Macedonia and the other in the Yugoslav capital, Belgrade, Briks said. They have made their intentions known either through the Red Cross, the United Nations or Canadian consular officials.

Briks told The CJN that of the four families, two will likely come to Canada under family reunification provisions, one to Vancouver and the other to Tecumseh, Ont. The other two families will come as convention refugees. He said the fate of all four families should be known within the next week or two.

Briks said several Canadian synagogues and federations have called JIAS for "procedural advice" on how to sponsor Jews from Kosovo.

Ethnic Albanians who fled the war in Yugoslavia may apply for refugee status in Canada, arguing they have a well-founded fear of persecution should they return home. Ottawa has hinted it would expedite those claims.

Briks said there are two main ways to help Kosovar Jews come to Canada. One is sponsorship through organizations like JIAS.

The other is to set up a "sponsoring group" comprised of five individuals whose credibility must be established first. The mechanism is called constituent group joint sponsorship.

Briks said the federal government has agreed to a joint program, under which it would provide two years of funding refugees' financial needs if the sponsoring group assists in the refugees' integration.

Briks and other JIAS representatives held meetings recently with federal immigration officials. Among the items discussed was the welfare of Jews in the Balkans.

In the meantime, JIAS has made available a list of individuals to call regarding constituent group joint sponsorship.

In Alberta and British Columbia, call Fikre Tsehai at 604-435-9750 (fax, 604-435-9923).

In Manitoba and Saskatchewan, call Ed Wiebe at 204-261-6381 (fax, 204-269-9875).

And in Ontario and Quebec, call Anne Woolger at 416-620-1169 (fax, 416-622-2308).

As well, JIAS notes that families with members who have fled to Albania or Macedonia should call the federal government's citizenship and immigration department's Kosovo hotline at 1-800-410-0009 (fax, 1-877-800-8834).

The global arm of JIAS, Hebrew Immigrant Aid Services (HIAS), and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, are also in the Balkans doing whatever they can to aid Jewish refugees.

Canadians join delegation to Kosovar refugee camp

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jack Hasen and Marc Gold returned from a recent visit to a Kosovar refugee camp in Albania, marked by the suffering and despair they witnessed.

Gold, 49, and Hasen, 42, who are both active in FEDERATION CJA and the Combined Jewish Appeal, were the only Montreal Jewish community lay officials – the other Canadian was Leo Goldfarb of Toronto – invited to join a fact-finding delegation of 26 from North America, organized by the U.S.-based United Jewish Communities (UJC), and led by Charles Bronfman.

During a rapid-paced week, the delegation travelled to New York, Israel, Albania, Budapest, and back to Israel again before returning home.

"We arrived at the refugee camp to a scene that was shocking," recalled Gold, a businessman and former law professor.

They saw thousands of people struggling to maintain a modicum of dignity in an area no larger than Hampstead Park, Gold said.

"It was a situation turned completely upside down. Resignation and despair [were] even more striking than the physical privations."

Hasen, also a businessman, was struck by the dearth of men. Only 15 percent or so of the refugees, he estimated, were men, a sign of their possible dire fate.

Gold and Hasen accompanied a relief plane from Israel – actually, Israel's 10th – which had brought upwards of 120 tons of relief and medical volunteers and supplies to the war-torn region.

Hundreds of non-Jewish Kosovar refugees arrived in Israel as part of efforts by the Jewish Agency and the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC). The Israelis set up a field hospital in Macedonia, where Kosovars also fled.

Meanwhile, because of NATO's incessant bombing, hundreds of Jews living in Belgrade found refuge in Budapest, leaving homes and professional careers behind. A significant number flew on to Israel, as part of pre-aliyah trips. Non-Jewish Kosovars in Israel were given the option of remaining.

Gold noted that in Budapest and in Israel, there was an "overwhelming feeling of stress" experienced by the Belgrade Jews, who in contrast to the Kosovars, were against NATO's actions. As was the case in the south of Yugoslavia, however, Jewish women and children leaving Belgrade greatly outnumbered the men.

"Males aged 14 to 60 could not leave," Hasen said.

Gold said the work of the Jewish Agency might not have been possible without the preliminary efforts of an Israeli volunteer group of young people called La-tet (to give). The group had arrived at the refugee camps, and was "establishing connections and effectively serving as the liaison with the Jewish Agency.

"These were young heroes," Gold said.

Shul without walls run by volunteers

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Orthodox Maon Noam Congregation, headed by Rabbi Hirsh Rabiski, operates in an un-orthodox fashion.

Here's a synagogue with no walls, no membership, no dues and no paid staff. Now in its fifth year, the volunteer-run congregation attracts Russian and other Jews from the former Soviet Union (FSU).

There's a core of about 60 people who turn up for Shabbat services at the Dan Family Residence at 15 Torresdale Ave., where a mechitzah divides chairs between men and women and an antique Aron Kodesh houses three sifrei Torah.

Classes offered

But the synagogue is just one aspect of the Maon Noam Jewish Cultural and Educational Network, which offers a myriad of classes in Talmud, Jewish mysticism and the teachings of the Lubavitcher Rebbe, Menachem Mendel Schneerson.

It was the Rebbe himself who directed Rabbi Rabiski to come to Toronto in 1990 to help lead the city's burgeoning Russian-Jewish community.

"He said the community here will one day become like seventh heaven," Rabbi Rabiski recalls.

That was after the Rebbe dispatched him to Ladispoli, the Italian transit city through which roughly 120,000 Soviet Jews passed during the 1970s and '80s en route to the west.

There, he spent a decade teaching, counselling and propping up spiritually, nervous new emigres who could not afford to pay him.

"The Rebbe always said not to take anything from people who need it," he says.

That in turn gave Rabbi Rabiski the impetus to start up a free synagogue in Toronto to reach out to his fellow Russian Jews, after having spent two years as education director at the Russian-Jewish Community Centre.

Everything Maon Noam offers, even a day care and an afternoon cheder for 15 children, is free of charge, and all its programs, holiday events and services are run by a cadre of about 50 devoted volunteers.

The congregation and its rabbi, the father of 12 children, aged three months to 19 years, depend on private donations.

Rabbi Rabiski says many people he met in Ladispoli have settled among Toronto's 35,000-strong community of Jews from the FSU.

The congregation isn't limited to its location on Torresdale. There's a Thornhill minyan at B'nai Shalom North Congregation and a Downsview minyan at the B'nai Brith residence on Bathurst Street. Some programs and classes are also held in private homes and apartments.

Over 300 people attended Passover seders hosted by the congregation at its Torresdale address. Services for major holidays take place at Congregation B'nai Torah.

The portable chupah is often taken outdoors for weddings under the stars, and members have bar mitzvahs for their sons.

The Riga-born Rabbi Rabiski, now 42, knows what it's like to have been a Jew under the Soviet boot. He and his family spent five years in refusal in Moscow, from 1966 to 1971, before immigrating to Israel.

The congregation's palindromic name literally means "residence of comfort," but it has a deeper, kabbalistic significance, Rabbi Rabiski explains. He invites anyone who wants to find out, to take one of his courses.

For details, call 398-7050.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

As we wind down towards the summer recess, let's reflect on some parliamentary moments of this most recent session.

Funniest Scene: Reform MP Mike Scott, was fully into a three-hour filibuster in the House talking about the Land Claims Act. Randy White, the Reform party House leader replaced Scott's glass of water with a spiked liquid. Now we know why they do not refer to the House as the "Chamber of Sober Thought"!

True Grit Award: No contest. Albina Guarnieri bucked the justice committee, the cabinet and the entire Department of Justice for three years to ensure passage of her private member's bill on consecutive sentencing for serial killers. The question puzzling political wordsmiths is if "Grit" is a nickname for Liberals, how come tiny Albina seems so lonely?

Greatest Irony: Herb Gray, the only Jewish minister in cabinet is responsible for the government's Millennium Fund – a billion-dollar program marking a decidedly un-Jewish milestone.

Luddite of the Year: While launching a new government Web site, Jean Chrétien looked blankly at the PC without a clue about how to operate the mouse until a student took his hand and helped him. Would that it were always so easy!

Lousiest Honeymoon: Consider poor Andy Scott whose wedding coincided with the airplane eavesdropping fiasco that ultimately cost him his job as solicitor general.

Saddest Moment: Shaughnessy Cohen's collapse in the House and subsequent death. Her husband, Gerry, lost a loving wife; the Jewish community lost a good friend; Parliament lost a spirited and devoted member.

Greatest Inspiration: The aforementioned Herb Gray. Despite the health challenges he faced over the last couple of years (over which we hope he has triumphed), the deputy prime minister maintains a full and vigorous schedule that is unmatched in the House. "Good for you, Herb!"

Quebec hospital fights to retain status

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Quebec government has applied to the Supreme Court of Canada to appeal a decision that allows Mount Sinai Hospital to continue as an institution with both short- and long-term beds.

The Quebec Court of Appeal recently upheld the hospital's right to retain its mixed specialization, in a case that has dragged through the courts for years.

Hospital president Elliot Bier said the decision means Mount Sinai will not have its funding reduced and it will not be obliged to merge its administration with that of Maimonides Hospital Geriatric Centre.

Mount Sinai is a 107-bed, 90-year-old institution that moved to Côte St. Luc almost a decade ago from Préfontaine in the Laurentians, where it had been founded as a tuberculosis sanitorium.

It has 57 long-term beds for the chronically ill, and 50 short-term beds – 35 for those with chest diseases and 15 for palliative care.

Bier said the government wants Mount Sinai to have only long-term beds. He believes the dispute is about money and the government's desire to cut health care funding wherever it can, and not about how best to serve the public.

Long-term beds are funded at a lower rate, he said, and Mount Sinai stood to lose between $1.3 and $1.5 million annually if it was forced to switch.

Maintaining 50 short-term beds also exempts Mount Sinai from having to share a single board of directors, executive director and other top managers with Maimonides, he said. Bill 120, the law overhauling the health care system, stipulates that only institutions with fewer than 50 short-term beds are required to unify their administrations with a similar, nearby institution.

This is what occurred with the Jewish Nursing Home and the Jewish Hospital of Hope, a move they fought unsuccessfully in court for years.

Bier is not overly concerned by Quebec's decision to go to the Supreme Court. First of all, it is by no means certain the high court will give leave to hear the case, and if it does, Bier said, it is not likely to be heard for three to five years.

He expects the Supreme Court to make known what it will do either later this month or in the fall.

The tussle with the government began not long after Mount Sinai's move to Côte St. Luc in the early '90s.The Quebec government had gone to the province's highest court after losing in Quebec Superior Court.

Bier said maintaining the hospital's original vocation of treating those with chest diseases, at least in part, was a condition of accepting the relocation. That deal included exchanging the Préfontaine hospital for the former Extendicare building in Côte St. Luc, and an interest-free loan for its expansion, which Mount Sinai is still paying off. In Montreal, Mount Sinai felt it could better serve the Jewish community, where the demand for long-term beds was great.

Bier concedes that there continues to be a shortage of such beds in the Jewish community, and that Mount Sinai has received pressure from the Jewish General Hospital (JGH) to increase its long-term beds. For years, the JGH has had to devote a high proportion of its beds to chronically ill patients waiting for placement.

The JGH has suggested that Mount Sinai's chest beds be moved to the JGH, but Mount Sinai has resisted, Bier said, because of its belief an institution that is specialized can ensure continuity of care better than a large, general hospital which has many demands on its facilities.

"For example, we have three beds now in a sleep apnea clinic. Would a general hospital do that? Hospitals tend to do what is trendy and what they can raise money for," he said.

Bier said Mount Sinai has the support of the Jewish Public Establishments Coordinating Committee, which groups all the health institutions in the community, in its dispute with the government.

Bier noted that Mount Sinai also has a responsibility to the public at large. Chest diseases continue to be among the top killers in North America, and Mount Sinai is one of very few institutions in Montreal that specializes in treating respiratory illness once it has passed the acute stage and the patient is expected to recover.

Chest patients have an average stay of 22 days, and many others are seen at Mount Sinai's outpatient clinic where a range of therapies and ancillary services are provided, he said. The hospital also has community outreach programs to raise awareness of respiratory disease and of ways to stop smoking, for example.

The palliative care unit is the second largest in Montreal, after that at the Royal Victoria Hospital, he said, adding that the JGH has only five beds dedicated to this sort of care of the terminally ill.

Although unifying administrations can be a cost saving, Bier argues that in the case of Mount Sinai and the much larger Maimonides, the cost could also be a loss of focus on short-term specialty care. Maimonides has about 450 beds, all devoted to long-term care. A single board might mean fewer people willing to speak up for Mount Sinai's particular health care mission, he said.

There's also no question that maintaining a separate administration and a specialization in chest care is important to Mount Sinai's donors and volunteers, who take pride in the institution they have built and do not want to relinquish control, he said.

נוסטינג היל - הסרט בשבילכם:

זהו סרט אנגלי, מבית היוצר של "ארבע חתונות והלוויה אחת" שהצחיק את כולנו לפני מספר שנים. הרעיון פשוט - מה קורה כשהשחקנית ההוליוודית הידועה והנחשקת ביותר מתאהבת בבחור לונדוני פשוט. הדיאלוגים כתובים חכם, ואתה מאמין לכל רגע שעובר על המסך. יו גרנט (הבחור הלונדוני) מוקף בחבורת ידידי נפש, ממש כמו ב"ארבע חתונות" - כל אחד יותר מצחיק ואמיתי מהשני. הוא עצמו גר בדירת רווקים עם בחור סקוטי תמהוני שאחראי ללא פחות משלושת רבעי הצחוקים שבסרט. הינה צחוק קטן על החשבון: הסקוטי פותח את המקרר בדירה המבולגנת שלהם ומתחיל לאכול מגביע של פלסטיק ואומר: ליוגורט הזה יש טעם קצת מוזר, איפה קנית אותו? אומר לו גרנט: זה לא יוגורט. אם תשתכל טוב תראה שזה מיונז. העולם יראה לכם אופטימי ומחייך בסוף הסרט. אה - וכמעט שכחתי - לאורך הסרט פזורים פזמונים מה-זה מדליקים, שהלכתי וקניתי את הקלטת לשמוע בנסיעה בג'יפ. תשע בסולם קורן.

לפני מספר שבועות חדתי לכם חידה - מה זה "זמריר". קיבלתי תשובה ממונטריאול - מה זה נָפָה. משהוא.

"זמריר- תשדיר פרסומת בכלי השידור המלווה זמר: בלועזית: Jingle . הסבר לשוני: יש כאן שתי אפשרויות שעמדו בפני הועדה באקדמיה ללשון העברית ואלה הן לעניות דעתי:

א. זמר+יר. הבסיס "זמר" אליו "הלחימו" יסוד נוסף בעל קונוטציה דו משמעית.
1. זמר+תשדיר>זמריר
2. זמר+דעיר>זמריר

ב. על דרך שיצרו סמליל (Logo-type), כלומר בסיס סמל+יל-, חזרה על העצור המסיים. בשני המקרים יש כאן צמצום המשמעות של הבסיס הסמנטי.

בברכה, קוראת קבועה רחל, רוזנברג מונטריאול."

בחירות: ישראל ואונטריו:

משהו רפואי:

בדיחה רפואית שקראתי בביטאון לרופאים שאני מקבל.
-"יש לך דלקת ריאות- אומר הרופא- אני רושם לך אנטיביוטיקה."
-"זוקטור,אומר החולה, שמעתי על מקרים שהרופא טיפל בחולה הדלקת ריאות ובסוף החולה מת מטיפוס."
מסתכל עליו הרופא ואומר:
"אין לך מה לדאוג, מיסטר ליבוביץ, כשאני מטפל בך בדלקת ריאות-אתה מת מדלקת ריאות!"

Jewish teacher program gets short-listed for grant

TORONTO — York University's Jewish Teacher Education Program in partnership with the Western Canadian Coalition of Jewish Educators has been short-listed in this year's competition to receive a Covenant Foundation Grant.

One of North America's most prestigious charitable foundations in the field of Jewish education, the Covenant Foundation was founded in 1990 by the Crown Family Foundation in partnership with the Jewish Education Service of North America.

This year, the foundation received over 240 applications for innovative programs seeking funding of up to $250,000 (US) over five years. York and the Western Canadian Coalition have made it to the semifinal stage along with 24 other applicants.

The Western Coalition is made up of Jewish day schools in Calgary, Edmonton, Vancouver and Winnipeg. Its mission is to work collectively to further the development of Jewish education in Western Canada.

Over the last year, the coalition has worked with York University's Jewish Teacher Education Program to develop a proposal to address the schools' most significant challenge: the recruitment and training of new teachers.

The plan is to recruit, every two years, a group from Western Canada that will pursue a teacher preparation program based at York, but specifically designed to ready participants for teaching positions in western Canadian communities.

Students will pursue an undergraduate degree and certification through York's Jewish Teacher Education Program. They will acquire field study and practice teaching experiences in Toronto and western Canadian schools.

In return for scholarship support during their student years, teacher candidates will commit themselves to working for a period in western Canadian day schools.

York's faculty of education and Centre for Jewish Studies expect that this initiative will serve as a model for other communities in Canada seeking to attract qualified teachers.

JCS, ICRF to hold Shabbat program

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — On June 25, Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS) and the Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF) will hold a combined Shabbat dinner for graduate students and young professionals in their 20s.

"There's more to university students than beer and partying. They are looking for meaning and fulfilment in their lives," says Stephanie Wener, program director of the Jewish Students' Federation at York University, and Talia Meister, director of programming at ICRF.

The dinner will be the fifth of its kind for ICRF, and the first one to be held jointly with JCS. It will be held in the north part of the city and can accommodate 120 people. Cost is $25, or $18 for students.

The event is an alternative to the "big bash" parties of ICRF's Young Associates, which are held twice yearly and attract up to 1,000 people per party.

Two Young Associate committee members came up with the Shabbat dinner idea in 1997 after attending a similar event on New York's Upper West Side.

"For people who want to meet other people, it's a great forum," said Meister. "It just took off right away."

Speakers at the kosher dinners – complete with Kiddush and Hamotzi – have included Susan Jackson of UJA Federation and Evan Solomon, founder of Shift magazine.

The speaker for this week's dinner will be Avrum Rosensweig of Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.

Money raised from the dinners is used for cancer research. For further information call the ICRF at 487-5246.

Iran's president seeks to open dialogue with Israel

BY SHARON SADEH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iranian President Mohammed Khatami is interested in opening a secret dialogue with Israel, and has asked senior British government figures to approach Jerusalem with the request.

Khatami suggested a series of confidence building steps between the two countries to try to break the current circle of distrust and suspicion, senior British officials told Ha'aretz.

The British sources said the information has been relayed to Jerusalem, with a recommendation that the Iranians be considered seriously.

Israeli sources said that they were unfamiliar with the Iranian proposals, which were new and needed careful study.

Khatami, in his talks with the British representatives, suggested the signing of arms control treaties between the two countries as a first step. His suggestions included:

• A regional agreement among all Middle Eastern countries possessing ground-to-ground missiles, not to launch a pre-emptive missile attack on another country that is a party to the agreement.

• A bilateral agreement regarding the disarmament of long-range ballistic missiles with non-conventional warheads, to be followed by a treaty in which both sides would undertake not to develop long-range missiles for military purposes, but solely for the launching of satellites into space.

The British sources said they believed the Iranians were acting in good faith, and urged Jerusalem to adopt a similar attitude.

They said that the Iranians told them that their arms buildup is not directed against Israel, but against other countries perceived as regional threats, primarily Iraq, Afghanistan and Pakistan.

Iran regards the latter two, not only as military threats, but as moral ones, due to their role in the international narcotics trade, the sources said.

Recently, Iran has agreed to cooperate with the European Union (EU) in combating the flow of narcotics from its central Asian neighbors to the west, and as a result has earned diplomatic credit and improved relations with the EU. Relations between Tehran and London have warmed up recently, and full diplomatic relations were restored last month.

Israeli sources said the Iranian proposals must be examined carefully, and cannot automatically benefit from an assumption of good faith.

"Khatami is less than totally informed when it comes to security affairs. The country's defence and security establishments are controlled by bodies not totally under his command, and his ability to have the final word on these matters is questionable at best," they said.

The Israeli sources also pointed out that the Iranians are sophisticated enough to change the tune of their rhetoric in accordance to which audience is being played to at any given time.

It is naive to assume that weapons being developed by Iran cannot pose a threat to Israel, the Israelis said, adding that whatever the Iranians are, they are most certainly not naive.

The British, however, feel that Iran commands trust regarding arms control, since it is a signatory to several important international arms proliferation treaties which Israel has traditionally refused to join.

Iran recently reaffirmed its commitment to an international treaty outlawing the use and development of chemical weapons, and is a signatory to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. Iran is also active in promoting a treaty outlawing the use of biological weapons.

The Iranians are sincere in their desire to regulate and even outlaw non-conventional weapons, especially chemical and biological weapons which they fear, having been one of the very few countries to have been on the receiving end of them during the long war between the Iran and Iraq that spanned most of the '80s, the British sources said.

The British also believe that Iran is truly interested in normalizing its relations with the West, and allowing their potentially rich country to reap the economic benefits that come with being an accepted player on the international scene.

They praise the Iranian record regarding the keeping of treaties, and have more than hinted that Israel's unwillingness to join the international community's major arms proliferation treaties make it somewhat suspect in this regard.

They also criticized Israel's traditional policy of regarding its security as entirely its own affair, and its record of taking unilateral action whenever it deemed it necessary, regardless of any international considerations.

This approach is outdated, they said, and is actually counterproductive since it fuels mistrust and suspicion, increasing strategic dangers rather then minimizing them.

The British said that they do not see Iran ever launching a pre-emptive non-conventional missile attack against Israel.

However, they do admit that Iran is in the throes of a major power struggle between moderate and militant conservative elements, and it is too soon to say who will come out on top.

They said that Israel should reconsider its policies regarding weapons proliferation irrespective of the outcome, since its current policies are considered unreasonable, promoting mistrust and Arab grievances against the West regarding the adoption of a double standard in these affairs, one for Israel and one for the rest of the world.

Syria wants to renew talks

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Something has stirred in Israel's frozen relations with Syria.

Benjamin Netanyahu's secret efforts to reach out to the Syrians were revealed, and various mediators showed up in Damascus, including Hafez al-Assad's biographer Patrick Seale and former U.S. secretary of state James Baker, who met with Assad.

Everyone here is concerned with what Assad wants, and what Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak's priorities should be: Peace with Syria and withdrawal from Lebanon first, or settlement with the Palestinians first and Syria later.

The news from Damascus, in the meantime, is not exciting. The Syrians want to resume talks with Israel after more than three years, but there is no sign of any new Syrian flexibility. First, Israel must commit to fully withdrawing from the Golan Heights, and then it can haggle over the details.

Barak responded happily to Assad's partial openness. Seale was invited for a series of meetings with senior officials of the new government, and Barak told him he intended to attain "peace of the brave" with the Syrians and that he was ready to make the painful decisions necessary to do so.

Maj.- Gen. Uri Saguy, champion of the "Syrian option" and a candidate for running the talks, took Seale to the Golan Heights to meet with settlers who used to be under his command in the Golani Brigade.

Seale was moved by Saguy's determination in the face of the harsh words spoken by his brothers-in-arms. He left, feeling like there had never before been so much willingness here for withdrawal from the Golan in return for peace.

In an interview with Ha'aretz last week, Barak dictated the Syrian army's inventory to explain why peace was essential. His other motive for reaching peace is to honor the promise of his election campaign: IDF's withdrawal from Lebanon within a year.

Assad holds the key. Barak believes he will be able to overcome Syrian opposition with international pressure and by offering the Syrian president an enticing package, including a promise that the pull-out from Lebanon is only an appetizer for an agreement on the Golan.

Barak's main inheritance from the talks with Syria in the days of Rabin, Peres and Netanyahu is that the public has internalized the price of peace: full withdrawal from the Golan.

Chief of IDF Intelligence Major General Amos Malka estimates that Assad will want to achieve peace in his lifetime, rather than leave the job for a new and inexperienced leader.

Barak says he won't discuss withdrawal before he hears what Israel will receive in the normalization of relations, security arrangements and water rights. The agreement is likely to include the following:

- Israel will withdraw from the entire Golan Heights. The border will be set in such a way that the Syrians will be able to say they are going back to the borders of June 4, 1967, and Israel will keep its essential interests. The possible solution: Hamat Gader will go to the Syrians, who in return, will move back from Lake Kinneret.
- The Golan and part of the Galilee will be disarmed and a force of foreign observers will be stationed there.
- Water rights have not yet been discussed.
- There will be an exchange of ambassadors in Damascus and Tel Aviv, but Syria will try to limit other normalization factors, such as tourism and trade.

Israel provides an oasis for kids family. But, as he pointed out, he is "away from car, away from my house. All I have is my tent..."

Some 300,000 ethnic Albanian refugees have flooded into this poor country of two million people since the beginning of the Kosovo crisis. Most are put in quickly organized camps such as Stankovic; others find a temporary home with distant relatives or friends. Macedonia has nine refugee camps on its territory, its Prime Minister Ljubco Georgica said.

Georgica, who met with the Israeli delegation upon its arrival, said that Macedonia has done all it could do, and hopes to first help the refugees return home and then rebuild its economy. The prime minister made a desperate plea to the Israeli and Diaspora mission members to help him and his people by investing in Macedonia.

Countries throughout the world are busy figuring out what they can do to help, and many are sending in humanitarian missions.

More than 90 percent of all ethnic Albanians have been expelled from their home in Kosovo by Serb forces, the U.S. State Department has said.

The Stankovic refugee camp, while in no way a sought after place to be, does offer something unique: its day activity centre.

The Council of Youth Movements in Israel (CYMI) runs activities for young people in an open field area in the Stankovic camp. Groups of 15 representatives of the 12 youth organizations included in the council operate programs for the young people in the camp. Each set of volunteers stays for 10 days.

A huge billboard with "CYMI – Israel loves children" and an Israel flag loom over the area.

"I feel very good being here," said Lilach Marom, one of the Israeli volunteers, who is a youth leader in Israel.

Asked how the refugees feel about Israel's presence in the camp, Marom said: "The word 'Israel' is like saying the Mashiach. They say Israel more than NATO."

The Israeli compound functions like an oasis for these kids. It is a getaway.

On top of the day activity centre, in which the kids sing Hebrew songs, play organized sports, facepaint and draw, every day from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m., Israel is also known worldwide for its help with the refugees.

"When you say the name Israel, people kiss you and embrace you and say thank you," explained Avi Pazner, world chair of Keren Hayesod. "Before NATO troops entered, they felt we were with them. What we did is an example that can be followed."

Keren Hayesod and the Jewish Agency sent the first medical team to Stankovic. Israel's field hospital was the first to treat the thousands of refugees who had fled their homes for a place unknown.

The two agencies have sent more than 150,000 tons of medical aid and supplies like baby food, diapers, blankets and tents to the refugees.

"Our organization usually doesn't deal with matters such as these," said Pazner. "But we cannot stand by. People like ours just cannot remain indifferent."

Julia Koschitzky, past chair of Keren Hayesod, said, "Considering our own tragic history, we're not going to stand by and watch this tragedy happen. We have to draw lessons from the past. Our efforts have shown the world who the Jews are." She was one of a handful of Canadian representatives on the Jewish Agency and Keren Hayesod aid mission to Stankovic on June 14.

After an hour's visit at the camp, the Jewish mission and its press entourage boarded the buses to go and meet Macedonia's prime minister at a hotel in Skopje.

Kids and adults came to the buses to say goodbye.

For Abdely, standing by a basketball net as he watched the buses leave the camp grounds, such a ride back to Pristina would be a dream come true.

• The Dalai Lama met with Israel's Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi, Yisrael Meir Lau, at the Western Wall in Jerusalem. The Dalai Lama, in Israel on a private three-day visit, said nonviolence could help bring about peace in the Middle East.

June 15

• The leader of Shas resigned all his responsibilities as party leader, in a move that could clear the way for the Orthodox party to join Prime-Minister-elect Ehud Barak's governing coalition. Aryeh Deri made his announcement before a meeting of Shas Knesset members.

• Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat called for international intervention if necessary in the Middle East, similar to the action that led to the Yugoslav withdrawal from Kosovo.

June 16

• Israeli jets launched strikes at suspected Hezbollah targets in northeast Lebanon near Syria. The attack was the furthest north Israel has struck in Lebanon this year. All planes returned safely, a military spokesperson said.

• An Israeli border police officer was indicted on charges of abusing Palestinians in his custody. According to prosecutors, Eran Nakash assaulted Palestinian teenagers he was transferring between prisons last month.

June 17

Skopje community retains its Jewish identity

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

SKOPJE, Macedonia — The Skopje Jewish cemetery's stone Menorah monument serves, not only as a memorial to the Holocaust victims of Macedonia, but as a silent witness of the centuries of Jewish history in this small republic.

Once known for its thriving Jewish community of thousands, Macedonia now has a few hundred Jews, with the bulk of them living in Skopje, a city of 400,000.

Before WWII, there was a thriving community in Bitola, a city bordering Greece, and in the capital city, Skopje. The Jews and the Macedonians had good relations. Anti-Semitism was never a problem.

Then on March 11, 1943, 7,200 Jewish Macedonians were deported, and sent to the death camps of Treblinka and Auschwitz. Almost everyone perished in the Holocaust. Those who survived did so with the partisans or in hiding.

"One hundred and fifty Jews in all of Macedonia escaped deportation," said Zdravko Sami, co-ordinator of Skopje's Jewish community. "Whoever was deported, died."

According to Macedonian and Jewish community officials, there is no anti-Semitism in Macedonia, nor was there any during the Jews and the republic's inhabitants' history together.

The Holocaust years are the exception to this seemingly utopian society. In April 1941, Macedonia, together with Thrace, in Greece, was conquered by the Germans. Hitler gave these two regions over to Bulgarian rule, for he and King Boris III of Bulgaria were personal friends, and Boris wanted to expand his territory, said Dr. Nissim Yosha, a recognized authority on Macedonian Jewish history.

In February 1943, Bulgaria committed to deliver 20,000 Jews to the Nazis: 12,000 from Macedonia and Thrace; 8,000 from old Bulgaria. In March 1943, the Jews from Macedonia and Thrace were deported to the death camps.

Ironically, when it came time to deport the Bulgarian Jews, Bulgarian parliamentarians refused to let the Jews of Bulgaria go.

The declaration that Macedonians have never been anti-Semitic is therefore not paradoxical, said Yosha, despite the horrible fate the Jews met during the Holocaust.

"The Macedonians were under Bulgarian rule. No one could resist unless they wanted to die," said Yosha, who guest lectures at Jerusalem's Hebrew University.

"Throughout Macedonian history, there has been no acts of anti-Semitism," Prime Minister Ljubco Georgica told a group of Jewish Agency and Keren Hayesod delegates at a lunch in his honor at the Hotel Continental in Skopje.

Today's Skopje Jewish community is now made up of just 186 people. There are no active synagogues, and there is no rabbi.

Still, the community is culturally very involved with its Jewish identity.

Viktor Mizrahi, speaking to the mission of agency and Keren Hayesod members who visited Skopje on June 14, said it is "with great honor and respect that we maintain our history."

Jewish events, commemorations, and holiday gatherings are held in the community centre, a square two-storey building on the corner of two side streets located in the city's central area.

Mizrahi said aside from a frequently published Jewish newsletter by the youth of the community, the younger generation get together weekly for Israeli folk dancing, and go on an annual trip to Israel.

And while culturally, the mainly middle class Jewish community is still thriving, religiously it is suffering.

There are eight 12- and 13- year old kids in the Skopje Jewish community today. None of them will have a bat or bar mitzvah. But that's not unusual either, said Zdravko Sami who has lived in Skopje all of his life.

"We don't do that here," said Sami about bar and bat mitzvahs. "You have to go to Belgrade [where there is a rabbi], but travelling in the area is not easy." Infrequently, a rabbi comes to visit the Skopje community.

Next year, Mizrahi, the community leader, is hoping to open Macedonia's first shul since 1963, when an earthquake destroyed the last synagogues in Macedonia. He is optimistic that with the building of a synagogue – Macedonia had 10 before the Holocaust – a rabbi will follow.

They are aiming for the new shul, which is to be housed in the Jewish community centre, to be ready for next March.

Asked what the synagogues looked like before they were destroyed, Sami, 45, said: "They disappeared before my time. On the very few pictures I've seen, they looked very beautiful."

In the meantime, the Jews gather in a small room in the community centre for holiday services in which community members take turns davening. The pre-war Torah, once read before thousands, is now used quite irregularly.

As the small community slowly rebuilds itself, its community leaders still promote aliyah.

Returning with the delegates to Israel on June 14, were seven girls and one boy, ages 16 to 19. The group came to Israel for a three-month ulpan program, where they joined 60 Belgrade teens at the Hadassah Ne'urim Youth Village. The aim of the program, in which they will study Hebrew, learn about Israel, and tour the country, is to enable the teens to explore aliyah options.

"When they come back, they will be a major asset to the community," said Sami. Or, if they choose to stay in Israel after the conclusion of the program, Sami said "our community does not consider this an abandonment.

"It's probably better for their own future, and the community will gain one more reference point in Israel."

This feeling of encouragement, that she is not abandoning her small community, made it easier for Lela Sadikario,18, to say goodbye. Sadikario has already decided that she will stay in Israel beyond the three months.

"Since I was 5 years old, my dream has been to go to Israel. I'm very Zionistic," she said.

Seventeen-year-old Rachella Mizrahi also plans to make aliyah, but will wait until after she finishes her final year of high school next year.

Mizrahi is one of four remaining survivors of her family's long history in Macedonia. Her family, which she said can be traced back more than 1,000 years, lost 52 members in the Holocaust.

While saddened that his daughter plans to leave home next year, Rachella's father Viktor is also excited that his daughter is moving to Israel. "My family is going to Israel to keep our family name [alive]," he said smiling.

"I'm very elated by the fact that I insisted on bringing back the teens," said Avi Pazner, world chair of Keren Hayesod.

Dismissing any notion that in bringing the teens to Israel, he is breaking up an already small community, Pazner said: "Every Jew that we can bring to Israel we should. They will rebuild their community in Israel. I don't know how long they can live in their country."

Viktor Mizrahi, although likely to see both of his children move to Israel in the near future, agreed with Pazner that the teens are not abandoning their community. "Even if not one Jew is left," he said. "The Jewish history and culture stays in Macedonia."

Clinical trials to cancer gene therapy set to begin

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL— Clinical trials of gene therapy for ovarian and colon cancer, which scientists hope may someday revolutionize the treatment of these diseases, will begin for the first time in Quebec at the Jewish General Hospital (JGH).

Gene therapy is still in its early stages of research and its use in humans is experimental, but studies in animals have been shown it may be effective in reducing tumors, said Dr. Gerald Batist, director of the McGill Centre for Translational Reseach in Cancer, which is based at the JGH.

"The goals of the trials are to confirm the safety and determine the efficacy of this particular therapy," he said. In both trials, patients will receive standard chemotherapy, as well.

The trials are being conducted in collaboration with other research centres in the United States and elsewhere, and the Centre hospitalier de l'Université de Montréal-Hôpital Notre Dame.

Until now, patients have had to go to the United States to receive this kind of "cutting edge" treatment, Batist said. However, he admitted at this point, scientists do not know if gene therapy will combat cancer any better than chemotherapy or radiation. "This is simply a step," he said.

Dr. Victor Sandor, another JGH oncologist, added that these trials offer "the treatment of tomorrow, today.

"This therapy can potentially benefit those in the trials themselves, and definitely benefit others in the future," he said.

Even if these trials prove positive, the doctors don't foresee gene therapy becoming part of mainstream medicine for at least three to five years.

Candidates that will be considered must meet strict criteria. In the first case, only patients with colon or rectal cancer that has spread to the liver will be accepted. They may have had prior chemotherapy, but not more than two different programs of treatment.

In the ovarian cancer trial, candidates must be recently diagnosed, and have residual tumors of less than 2 centimetres but more than 0.5 cm in size, requiring chemotherapy.

In both cases, patients must be in otherwise generally good health.

Those selected for the trials will have healthy P53 genes inserted into their cancerous cells, in the hope that these genes will affect the activity of the abnormal cells. P53, known as the "guardian" gene, normally controls cell growth and is the most commonly defective gene in many cancers. (Candidates will be tested to determine if they have an abnormal P53 gene.)

The genes inserted will be synthesized in a laboratory.

The researchers say one of the biggest challenges of this kind of therapy is delivering the genetic material to the appropriate cells in a way that is specific, efficient and safe. The procedures used in these trials involve the latest technology.

In the case of the colon cancer patients, a pump is implanted into their abdomen just under the skin, which will infuse the P53 gene via a catheter, into a blood vessel in the liver.

The agent that delivers the gene into the cancer cell is a version of the adenovirus, the virus that causes common respiratory and eye infections. It will be modified to eliminate its disease-causing properties, but retain its ability to encapsulate genes and penetrate cells.

Patients will also receive chemotherapy through this pump. The medicine is periodically injected through the skin into the device. Chemotherapy received this way should not make the patient feel as ill as that taken intravenously or orally, because cells are killed only in the affected area and not throughout the body.

The ovarian patients will have a catheter implanted under the skin leading into the abdominal cavity, through which the P53 gene is injected. They will get chemotherapy intravenously.

Both implant procedures require the patient to undergo surgery by general anesthetic. In both trials, about half the patients will be randomly selected to receive P53 and the others will be in a control group.

The researchers believe any side effects, such as infection or allergic reaction, are not very likely or will be tolerated.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I have heard that although nuts are high in fat, it is good fat. Is this true?

A. Nuts have been shown to possess heart-healthy properties. They include healthy doses of mono- and polyunsaturated fats as well as the antioxidant vitamin E and the amino acid arginine.

Q. My infant is ready to start eating pureed meats. I would like to make this food myself. How do I go about it?

A. I have actually made pureed meat myself. Bake chicken, or broil beef, veal or lamb. It is important to make sure all are well cooked.

In a food processor, puree meat with either water, plain stock (homemade with no added salt, sugar, pepper or onion), or a combination of fruit or vegetables with water (I have used chicken with applesauce or sweet potatoes and a little water, for example), to achieve a thin consistency like that of infant cereal.

Author's reading transports audience to Russian shtetl

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Lilian Nattel, author of The River Midnight, received the prestigious Martin and Beatrice Fischer Prize for Fiction at the 11th annual Jewish Book Awards, on June 9 in the Leah Posluns Theatre.

The first-time novelist read a passage of her book to a clearly delighted audience that was temporarily transported back to a fictitious 19th-century Russian-Polish shtetl of Blaszka, where the story takes place.

In the foyer after the ceremony, Nattel was surrounded by readers, each clutching a book for her to autograph.

Published here by Knopf Canada, The River Midnight has won favorable reviews in the New York Times, the London Times, Time Magazine and other major international publications.

Earlier this year, the sale of the manuscript to the American publisher, Scribner, made headlines when it produced an exceptionally high advance, reportedly in the six-figure range.

"This award is very special for me, because it's a way for me to publicly acknowledge the fact that it's my Jewish heritage that has brought me success, and made a writing life possible for me," Nattel, the 41-year-old daughter of Polish-Jewish immigrants, told The CJN.

"That's really amazing when you consider what my parents have gone through and what the Jews have gone through. To find success and accolades in the very heart of my Jewish identity, here in Canada in 1999 – I can't tell you how amazing that is for me."

The Fischer Prize was the first of 10 awards, some accompanied by cheques of up to $1,000, given out in 10 categories. There were two other fiction awards: the Louis L. Lockshin Memorial Prize went to Nora Gold for Marrow and Other Stories (Warwick), and the Isaac Frischwasser Memorial Award for Young Adult Fiction went to Irene N. Watts for Goodbye Marianne (Tundra).

Holocaust themes did not dominate the evening as in previous years, but that inescapable subject was still well represented. The Betty and Morris Aaron Prize for Holocaust Memoir went to Elizabeth M. Raab for And Peace Never Came (Wilfred Laurier University Press), while The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem Award in Holocaust History went to Allan Levine for Fugitives of the Forest (Stoddart).

In other categories, the Joseph and Faye Tanenbaum Award for Canadian Jewish History went to Gerald Tulchinsky for Branching Out: the Transformation of the Canadian Jewish Community (Stoddart), while the Morris Winemaker Prize in Literary Criticism went to Kenneth Sherman for Void and Voice: Essays on Literary and Historical Currents (Mosaic).

Noah N. Shneidman won the Sam Bojman Memorial Prize in Jewish History for Jerusalem of Lithuania: The Rise and Fall of Jewish Vilnius (Mosaic), while Robin McGrath won the Henry Fuerstenberg Award for Poetry for Escaped Domestics (Killick).

Finally, the Dorothy Schoichet President's Award for Biblical and Rabbinic Scholarship went to Rabbi Elyse Goldstein for ReVisions: Seeing Torah Through a Feminist Lens (Key Porter).

Signing books in the foyer afterwards, Rabbi Goldstein told The CJN that she was very grateful to the committee for honoring her book.

"In choosing a book on feminism as the winner of the Biblical Scholarship award, it's an acknowledgement that feminist scholarship is scholarship," she said. "It's not marginalized, it's about the Bible from a woman's perspective, and that is very meaningful for me."

Award-winner Kenneth Sherman expressed a similar appreciation for the awards ceremony, which he said "is helping to create a community of readers. I think Adam (Fuerstenberg, chair of the Jewish Book Awards committee) and the committee are fantastic for doing this every year. It's a very important event for the Jewish community."

Casting an eye over the several hundred people at the post-awards catered reception, Fuerstenberg seemed to be thinking of ways to improve the event for next year. "We're still not getting enough people from south of Eglinton," he mused. "Next year we've got to find the funds to put an ad into the Globe and Mail to attract the mainstream literary community...

"Jewish writers are mainstream writers," he continued. "Good writing sells itself."

The MC for the evening was Frances Mandell.

Multifaith production debuts

By BARABARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — At the Leah Posluns Theatre, which was filled to capacity on this June night, all eyes were riveted on Ayelen Liberona, the solo dancer performing The Shulamite's Wedding Dance to music traditionally played at Arab wedding celebrations.

The Traditional Arab Music Ensemble, led by ethno-musicologist George Sawa, provided the music. Plucking the psaltery, a harp-like instrument, Sawa accompanied a female vocalist singing in Arabic, as Liberona twirled around the stage.

When the wedding dance ended, the audience's attention shifted to the Lachan Choir, standing on stage just behind Sawa and his ensemble. Lachan, led by Cantor Benjamin Maissner, performed a Hebrew song, Ts'ena Ur'ena from Shir Hashirim (Song of Songs), composed in 1922.

The juxtaposition of Hebrew and Arabic music reflected the multicultural flavor of the recent multi-faith production of Song of Songs, which offered Jewish, Christian, and secular interpretations of the biblical love poem ascribed to King Solomon.

Local artists brought the ancient text to life in a multi-faceted production encompassing drama, choral music and dance, which was presented by the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC), the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) and Trinity St. Paul's United Church.

Performed three times – twice at Trinity St. Paul's and once at the Leah Posluns Theatre – each show featured one of three choirs: the Toronto Chamber Choir, the Trinity St. Paul's Choir, and the Lachan Choir, who all performed the same songs. Spanning 400 years, the choral repertoire was totally inspired by Songs of Songs.

The Song of Songs production culminated in the world premier of a new dance work choreographed by Shula Saltzman of the Me'irim Dance Company. The Me'irim group danced to Shir Hashirim, a cantata composed by Milton Barnes, who was on hand to conduct.

The musicians performing his cantata included Chamberworks, a chamber ensemble; a female chorus; and soloists Renee Bouthot, a soprano and Maissner, a tenor.

Sawa, a musical historian, who had been involved with the Song of Songs for two years, told The CJN he enjoyed working on the production. "The text of the Song of Songs is a very juicy love song," he said.

"We speak like this way back at home in the Middle East . The language is very flowery and multi-syllabic...The classical songs in Arabic sound very much like the Song of Songs."

Conductor Barnes called the performance "splendid. It was a pleasure it finally happened. It was a relief it finally happened. It was brewing for so long."

Bouthot, a soprano, said she was thrilled with the performance. "I felt that we just sailed away. You get that feeling when a performance goes really well."

Bill Emery, executive director of the Bloor JCC praised the performers. "I thought it was fantastic. I thought the multi-cultural aspect was unique. It was the interfaith part and the multicultural part that attracted us.

"And that's what attracted Trinity St. Paul's to working with the Jewish,Community Centre. They were looking to work with the [Jewish] community. We became their logical choice. The Song of Songs presented the perfect vehicle for working together."

Jewish Films: Four films by Russian-Jewish filmmaker Ephraim Sevela are being shown around town this week, with Sevela in attendance. Lullaby has been called "the most powerful film about the catastrophe of European Jews ever seen in the United States," while Chopin's Nocturne won the Audience Favorite award at a Russian film festival three years ago.

Lullaby (in English) and The Parrot That Speaks Yiddish (in Russian) are being screened at Fairview Library Theatre, 7 p.m., June 24. $10 for both films.

The same films are being shown June 27, 11 a.m. at the Royal Ontario Museum Theatre, also $10 for both.

Chopin's Nocturne (silent, with music) and Charity Ball (in Russian) are being screened June 27 at 2:30 p.m. at the Royal Ontario Museum Theatre. $10 for both. Tickets available on the day of the shows at the box offices. 398-9774.

In the Spotlight: As a child, Theo Tobiasse spent the war years locked up in hiding with his parents in a tiny Paris apartment, during which time his main solace was his art. When Tobiasse finally saw daylight again, he had amassed a large file of drawings.

A designer for the advertising world by day, Tobiasse painted by night, eventually gaining recognition as an important Jewish artist. Today he is best known for his lively and captivating figures, surrounded in vibrant colors. He has also painted various tributes to Israel.

In the Greater Toronto Area, Klim Art Publishers Ltd. is showing Fifty Springs of Israel, a collection of seven lithographs by Tobiasse. The gallery is situated at 1238 Centre St., Thornhill; 905-882-0884.

Show surveys race/ethnic relations

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"Canada has a bit of an unpleasant past," observes a Toronto high school student delicately, voicing a monumental understatement. She appears early on in Toward a Just Society, Vision TV's bracing survey of race and ethnic relations in Canada since World War II.

The documentary, to be aired on Monday, June 28 at 9 p.m., is produced and directed by David Stein for the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews. It is by turns informative, shocking, inspiring and thought provoking.

Let's face it. Canada, a model of racial diversity and tolerance today, was once an inhospitable country if you were a Jew, a black, an Asian, a native Indian or a southern European with swarthy features. The powers-that-be, the British and French elite, wanted "to keep Canada for themselves," comments Italian-Canadian broadcaster Johnny Lombardi.

The social climate was such that anti-Semitism, be it blatant or subtle, was endemic. Canada, says York University history professor and former Canadian Jewish Congress president Irving Abella, was an "uncomfortable" place for the majority of Jews.

They could not aspire to many types of jobs, and were kept out of certain residential neighborhoods. In some ways, Jews were nothing but second class citizens.

Canada's restrictive immigration policy favored Anglo-Saxons and northern Europeans. Canada deigned to admit no more than a few thousand Jews fleeing fascist persecution. Jewish refugees from Germany and Austria were absurdly interned as "enemy aliens." In short, Canada's record as a humanitarian bastion was shameful.

There is more. Japanese Canadians in British Columbia were resettled in prisoner-of-war camps following the outbreak of World War II. Native peoples were segregated from mainstream society, and indeed, the federal government tried to eradicate their so-called "anachronistic and dysfunctional" culture. Blacks, of course, were the lowest on the totem pole.

Change came gradually. Due to a labor shortage after 1945, Canada took steps to liberalize its xenophobic immigration code, though former prime minister Mackenzie King was none too keen about its possible consequences. Human rights legislation was passed in the 1950s, and in 1960, a bill of rights was finally enacted.

Toward a Just Society credits former prime minister Pierre Trudeau for having promoted ideals which fostered multiculturalism, a concept which inspired a flowering of ethnic pride but which was at odds with French Canadian nationalism.

The Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Trudeau's baby, enshrined multiculturalism. Yet its success has spawned a backlash. "White pride" movements (the Western Guard and the Heritage Front) have arisen, racial violence against minorities has increased, and resistance to an open immigration policy has swelled.

Warren Kinsella, a writer who monitors these nefarious groups, claims that Canadian racists should not be underestimated. They are masterful communicators, they disseminate their noxious views on the Internet, and they have been effective in recruiting young, impressionable Canadians to their cause.

According to Abella, intolerance has become "the greatest growth industry" of the 1990s. It's a disconcerting development, and should be watched vigilantly. Yet, as Toward a Just Society rightfully argues, Canada has changed tremendously and come a long way in some 50 years.

Awards for Canada-Israel business

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

TORONTO — Loblaws and Canadian Highways International were two of the winners at the Canada-Israel Business Excellence Awards, held recently at the Inn on the Park Hotel.

President's Choice International, a division of Loblaws Brands Ltd., was honored for its extensive exports to Israel. The company began exporting President's Choice and No Name products to Israel in 1996 and is now exporting around 450 different items to the country. Its annual sales exceed $5 million.

"We have an excellent relationship with Israel," said Ell Wilson, director of export operations and development for President's Choice.

The big sellers in Israel, he said, are cookies, ice cream and the No Name products.

Canadian Highways International received the award for outstanding achievement in Israel during the bi-annual ceremony. In 1998, the company was selected to finance, design, build and operate the $1.1 billion Cross Israel Highway. The 86 km electronic toll road will run north-south through the heart of Israel just east of Tel Aviv.

"[The award] came as a surprise...There was significant competition," said chief operating officer Margaret Kelch, noting that the Cross Israel Highway is an important tool for the country's economic development.

David Azrieli, founder and president of Canpro Investments Ltd., was honored with the award for direct investment in Israel. His real estate business currently owns 6,300,000 square feet of commercial property in North America.

Canpro opened the first shopping mall in Israel in 1985 and manages two other major malls in Beersheva and Jerusalem.

Tel Aviv underwent a dramatic change with the construction of the Azrieli Centre, the largest retail development in Israel. Often referred to as the "jewel in the crown", the magnificent Azrieli Centre is comprised of three huge officer towers connected by a fully rented shopping area. The centre provides state-of-the-art business facilities and includes an open-air amphitheater, a health spa and cinemas.

The evening was hosted by the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce, a non-profit organization that promotes trade and investment between Canada and Israel.

For imports to Israel, Revelle Home Fashions came out on top. In 1994, the company worked with Israeli mills and created fabrics for the North American market. Approximately 85 percent of cotton used in Revelle products is now being imported from Israel. Items range from cotton jacquard woven tablecloths to bed linen.

International Neural Machines (INM) won for Canada-Israel joint ventures in research and investment. The eight-year-old company deals with artificial intelligence software and provides solutions for automating Internet, and e-commerce data processing.

INM's partnership with Elscint and General Electric of Israel created ELGEMS, one of the world's largest manufacturers of nuclear medicine equipment.

"This is a time- and money-saving enterprise for physicians," said Gideon Vardi, executive vice-president and chief operating officer of INM.

"This venture will put another layer of accuracy to make the physician's life easier," he said.

INM's international customer base includes companies in Sweden, Denmark, Australia and the United States. Royal Bank, CIBC, and Bell Canada are among its Canadian customers.

Sports gear comes clean

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It must be a guy thing.

It's a good bet that women wouldn't put up with it – at least that's been Aussi Hagshi's experience.

In the past six months, wives, mothers and girlfriends – and increasingly men – have said enough to stinking, putrid, unhygenic hockey equipment.

Hagshi knows it too. Six months ago, the 30-year-old entrepreneur opened PlayClean Sports, located next to Chesswood Arena near the Downsview airport. Hagshi promises to get the stink out of most sports equipment left with him.

PlayClean handles everything in a hockey bag except skates and helmet, Hagshi said. Using large, industrial strength machines, the equipment is cleaned according to manufacturers' specifications with mild, non-perfumed detergent and then hung to dry in a specially ventilated room.

"If you wash it regularly, you won't get the horrible smell associated with it," he said. Washing will remove the mold and mildew that combine with body salts to ruin the equipment over time. Hagshi recommends cleaning equipment several times a year, based on the frequency of use.

Since he opened the business, he's increased the company's profile and developed several larger accounts. In addition to the individuals who bring their equipment to him – including goalie pads and body armor – PlayClean has acquired 17 MTHL team accounts.

He projects revenues of $100,000 for his first year of business.

PlayClean's price list kicks in at $5.42 for boys' shoulder pads, $7.19 for men's. An express service (one to two days) is sightly more expensive than the regular service (three days).

PlayClean offers a $26.60 package for regular service, which includes everything in the hockey bag – jocks, suspenders, neck guards, jerseys – including the bag itself.

Hagshi believes PlayClean meets a real consumer need and has plenty of room to grow. He hopes to expand through the GTA and customers have told him his business would go over bigtime in the U.S. northeast, where hockey is a yuppie sport. He's also branching out into other sports, like football and lacrosse.

An MBA graduate from York University's Schulich School of Business, Hagshi came upon the business almost by accident. A little over a year ago, he was sitting in a dressing room "and it was getting small because some guys had so much space to themselves."

He tried to find a place for them to clean their equipment but came up empty.

"It struck me as weird that no one has tried to do this in Canada," he said.

He opened PlayClean Sports with money borrowed from his parents, Pnina and Shane, and from lending institutions.

Nude model loves his work

By LORI FIREMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Morton Kazaz is not a shy man. Loud and confident, he is eager to tell one all about his life.

But it is perhaps what he shows that is the more intriguing, for Kazaz makes his living as a life model, grinning and baring it all daily for artists and photographers.

So what's a nice Jewish man doing in a job like this? "Well," he answers, smiling, "I was looking for something interesting, and I saw this episode of The X-Files which had a scene in an art class. I was fascinated by it, and I have always been a fan of nudes, in every form."

Indeed, his admiration ranges from classical art photos to the Playboy centrefolds that grace his impressive magazine collection.

So Kazaz, 33, called around to see if there was a need, and soon found himself "doing it and loving it," he says proudly.

With three years of modeling experience under his belt – so to speak – his career is still going strong. Having established an extensive and diverse portfolio, including being a recent Sunshine Boy, he says regular agencies are requesting his service.

His job definitely has its advantages. Unlike most models who must either starve themselves or bulk up to get work, life models come in a variety of shapes and sizes, so he doesn't have to knock himself out pumping iron at the local gym.

Still, Kazaz keeps his naturally trim form in shape by "eating right and staying active," particularly in the summer when he can take advantage of the warm weather and participate in team sports.

Certainly, in his free time, Kazaz tries to keep busy, because once he arrives at a session, he must be prepared to sit still for long periods of time.

Though he is used to art classes that allow the model reasonable breaks, he recalls an unfortunate assignment in which he was made to sit for 75 minutes without recess.

"The teacher said she didn't want her students to lose their momentum, but I sure lost mine," he says.

And what does he do to keep it going? "I just think about sports, my daily plan, my wife."

Yes, he's married, and no, she is neither a model nor does she love being married to one. Though she is outwardly supportive, Kazaz knows she can't be thrilled with him being photographed nude – alone or with other naked women.

Her approval is generous, however, compared to his family in Israel. They still can't understand his career choice.

Nonetheless, he retains the Jewish values they instilled in him, keeping kosher and refusing work on Friday or Saturday.

Family opinion notwithstanding, Kazaz is a man who loves his work, and who is still amazed with the happy and unencumbered path his life has taken.

He remembers himself as a cringing teenager "who wouldn't be caught dead in a tank top or shorts," and "never thought beyond the mainstream, as far as jobs."

Having worked as a retail buyer, in customer service, and even as an investment agent, he never dreamed he would find a job that made him so happy, "or so naked," he adds sheepishly.

He particularly likes the flexible hours and the freedom of spirit nude modeling brings.

What he doesn't like is competing with women for work. So in the spirit of – if you can't beat em, join em – Kazaz had the gumption to branch out as an agent.

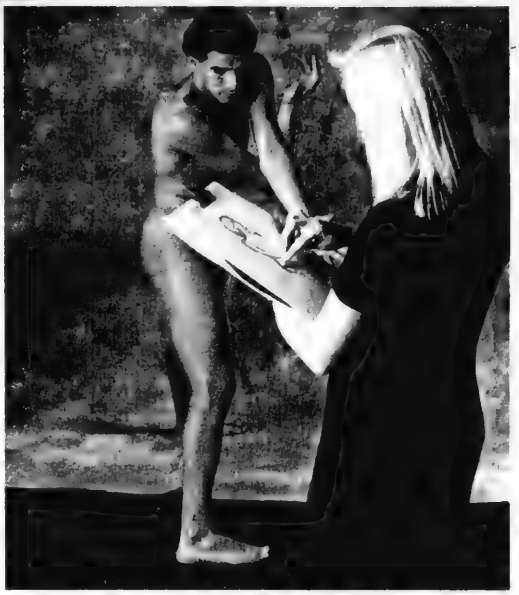
Always a go-getter, this longtime entrepreneur, who still enjoys a successful sports and movie memorabilia business, has become a scout, recruiting the very women who were stealing his assignments.

It's tough, but he is fair, he says, accepting all prospects, and working only on commission from the agencies that hire his models.

Though it started slowly, interest has begun to build and he now boasts a stable of desirable models and actresses in his employ.

As with his own modeling experience, it wasn't easy to establish himself in this new role, but he believes in being persistent.

All this goes to show that model Morton Kazaz is more than just a pretty face.



Morton Kazaz likes the freedom of spirit nude modelling brings.

Quick-skating teen selected by OHL's Sarnia Sting

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — How good do you have to be for an Ontario Hockey League (OHL) junior team to draft you, even though you're an underage player?

Well, 105 points (65 goals, 40 assists) in 70 games as a bantam doesn't hurt; the fact you were selected to try out for the Ontario Under 17 provincial team – one of 95 teens from across the province – is another factor in your favor.

And let's not forget that even as a kid, you always played against youngsters one or two years older than yourself.

Put that package together, add jet-fast speed, high skill levels and the willingness to get your nose dirty, and you can see why the Sarnia Sting chose 16-year-old Eric Himelfarb in the fourth round of the OHL's priority draft.

Himelfarb, who played for the Don Mills Flyers last season, will attend the Sting's camp in September with the full expectation that he can make the team despite his youth.

The Sting's coach and general manager, Mark Hunter, sees it pretty much the same way.

"I like the way he plays," Hunter said. "I'd be shocked if he doesn't push the issue."

An impressive stamp of approval indeed, but Himelfarb is keeping his options open – there's always the alternative of U.S. college hockey. Still, he has his sights set on playing in the OHL and failing that there's always a stop in Tier II junior A en route to the OHL.

"Nothing is etched in stone," he said.

Coming from a middle of the pack bantam team, Himelfarb, a centre, was given a heavy work load last season and he played in all kinds of situations. Even though he prefers to dish off the puck to his wingers, his stats show he can put the puck in the back of the net. And there's the God-given talent that allows him to make plays.

"Skating is my best asset," said Himelfarb, who's only 5-foot-9, 145 pounds. "I was just blessed with it."

Again, Hunter agrees. "He's not very big, but I like his skills. He's a really good skater and he plays really hard.

"I see a young man who likes to compete and play the game of hockey. You don't have to go looking for him on the ice...He makes good plays, one-on-one. He's an all-round player."

Hunter expects him to put on some weight, bulking up to the 175-lb. range. But size isn't the determining factor when it comes to Himelfarb.

"One of the scouting reports compared him to a little Mike Peca (the Buffalo Sabres' captain). The little guy competes," said Hunter, who had a long NHL career with the Montreal Canadiens.

Himelfarb has always been competitive when it came to hockey. His mother, Anne, remembers starting him out when he was only 4 years old. Even at that age, "he was anxious to play and he was a wonder right from the start."

As a 6-year-old, he played AAA hockey – the highest level – against kids who were eight.

Over the course of his career, he played for a number of teams, including the Young Nats and the Thornhill Islanders. Like other elite players, he attended summer hockey camps and he rounded out his summers playing rep baseball for Thornhill. He attended Associated Hebrew Schools until Grade 7.

The family was willing to make the sacrifices needed to allow Eric to reach his full potential as a hockey player, Anne said. There was the cost of equipment, registrations, out-of-town travel and hotel bills, but it was well worth it, she added.

"When you hear about so many kids today ending up in pool halls, street corners and malls....

"We knew where he was, who his friends are and that he was having fun and doing well," she said.

Eric has already begun training for the Sting's fall camp, skating once or twice a week and working out in the gym. One of his work-out buddies is Michael Henrich, a star with the OHL's Barrie Colts who was selected in the first round of the NHL entry draft last summer by the Edmonton Oilers.

The Henrich and Himelfarb families are friends and vacation together, Eric said. "I work out in the same gym as he does in Thornhill."

Henrich, he acknowledges, is an "inspiration," and like the Colts' forward, Himelfarb shares some of the same goals.

"It's always been my dream to play in the NHL, but there's still a long way to go," he said.

Eric Himelfarb

Roger Neilson to hold hockey camp in Israel

TORONTO — For the third straight year, NHL coach Roger Neilson will pack up his summer hockey camp in mid August and head to the Holy Land.

Neilson, head coach of the Philadelphia Flyers, will run his school for hockey enthusiasts from Aug. 8 to 22 at the Canada Centre rink in Metulla, on Israel's northern border.

Campers will participate in on-ice practice and game sessions then tour, hike, rappel and kayak through the northern region of Israel. They'll also get a taste of day to day life as experienced by Israelis.

Last year, 15 North American teens and 45 Israelis took part in the program. A similar number is expected in 1999.

Steven Dubinsky of the Calgary Flames will join Neilson, an additional NHL player, and a number of instructors from Neilson's camp based in Lindsay, Ont., for the camp in Israel.

Previous NHL participants included Bill Lindsay of the Florida Panthers and Danius Zubrus, now of the Montreal Canadiens. Zubrus' experience in 1998 at the Neilson camp was documented on three episodes of NHL Cool Shots earlier this season. The NHL-produced series can be seen weekly on CBC and CTVSN in Canada.

Neilson's hockey school is sponsored in part by UIA Federations Canada in conjunction with the Canada Israel Experience Centre (CIEC). Roots Canada joined as a sponsor in 1998 and Easton Sports Canada has agreed to serve as a sponsor beginning this summer.

The CIEC is handling the Canadian end of the summer camp arrangements. Cost of the program is $1,395 plus airfare.

For more information, contact CIEC at 1-800-567-4772 or in Toronto, call 398-6931.

יהודה עמיחי

פעם נשאל ישראלי חילוני כיצד יתכן שהוא מצחיר על עצמו כאחד שלא מאמין. השיב הבחור שהוא דווקא כן מאמין. תמה השואל וביקש לדעת מה מאפיין את חדת שבה הבחור מאמין וחני"ל השיב: שירתו של יהודה עמיחי.

רבים המבקשים לפענח את סוד הצלחתו של עמיחי בקרב ציבור קוראיו, הצלחה שעלתה על גדולים אחרים בני דורו כדן פגיס, אמיר גלבע, נתן זך וחיים גורי. עמיחי הוא זה שחוכתר כמשורר/נביא. זה המשורר שביצירתו נשמעה מהדהדת קולה של האומה, בשילוב קולו של חפרט, הקולקטיב והאישי שזורים זה בזה.

כך, כאשר כתב עמיחי על אביו שהיה "ארבע שנים במלחמת/...ובנה אותי יום-יום משלוותי/רחמעטות כל-כך,אשר לקט/...הוא מלא עיניו בהם והוא טעה: אל כל מלחמותי יוצא אני" חשנו שמדובר במדינה חצעירה שבתקומתה נאלצה להילחם על נפשה שוב ושוב אך, בעת ובעונה אחת נדמה היה לנו שהמלים נוגעות בנו כפרטים, במאבק חבין-דורות האישי, האינדיבידואלי.

כך או כך, משמתפרסם ספר חדש של יהודה עמיחי חוגגים המוני אוהדיו. פתוח סגור פתוח, הוצאת שוקן,ספרו חחדש של עמיחי יחפך אף הוא ללהיט ספרותי.

שוב בפנינו קובץ נדיר שבו הלאום והפרט שזורים זה בזה. "למדתי אחבה בילדותי בבית הכנסת של ילדות/בעזרת הנשים בעזרת הנשים שמאחורי המחיצה/שכלאה את אמי עם כל הנשים והנערות." האב פתוח סגור פתוח מייצג בדרך כלל את הממד הציבורי והאם מספקת את חידע הפרטי. "וכשאמי מתה הצטרפו כל הבבואות הקטנות/ לנבואה גדולה אשר תגיע עדי נבואת אחרית הימים."

מנושאי השירים המעולים שבספר: האמונה והתפילה, התנ"ך ומדרשים; "משה הרים את שתי ידיו/ בקרב נגד העמלקים כדי לחזק את הלוחמים/ וביימינו זה סימן לכניעה."

כדרכו, מיטיב עמיחי לבטא חשיבה מורכבת במלים פשוטות, נחדרות. כך גם בעיסוקו ביחסים בין נשיות וגבריות ובטיבה חדקדוקי של השפה; "לילה, הדבר הנשי ביותר הוא בלשון זכר/ אבל הוא גם שם אשה. יום הוא זכר ויממה נקבה/ זָכָר וָנְקֵבָה בנקבה וכמיהת אשה באיש. כלומר שנינו, כלומר אנחנו."

יפות התמונות הפשוטות' שעמיחי מעלה: "ראיתי איש קורא על המקום בספר מסעות ותירות/ והוא יושב באותו המקום עצמו. וסוגר את הספר/ והולך למקום אחר."

על מהות החיים: "אני חושב שהחיים הם חזרות לקראת/ ההצגה האמיתית. ובחזרות אפשר עוד להכניס/ שנויים, למחק משפט ולהוסיף דבור, להחליף/ שחקנים ובמאים ואולמות עד להצגה האמיתית/ שבה שוב אין משנים, ולא משנה שאין משנה/ כי ההצגה מורדת מיד אחר תפנם הראשונה."

יותר מכל הופתעתי מהפעלתנות חצעירה שבספר זה. יהודה עמיחי, סופר באמצע שנות השבעים, כתב ספר מלא בעוצמת חיים. וכך הוא מעיד על עצמו: "רחל המשוררת שרה יואולי לא היו הדברים מעולם/ אבל אני רוצה לשיר על הדברים שהיו מעולם, היו ודאי."

About Food

Dear Norene

Oh, the thrill of the grill! Although the usual fare is steak, chicken, hot dogs and burgers, grilled vegetables are also delicious! Thickly slice some eggplant, zucchini, portobello mushrooms, onions and/or peppers. Sprinkle with olive oil, balsamic vinegar, salt, pepper and basil. Grill about 5 minutes per side.

Whether you use charcoal or gas is a personal choice. Gas grills are easy to light and you can control the cooking temperature. Here are some simple tips.

To add flavor, soak 3 or 4 handfuls of wood chips in water while food is marinating. Toss chips on top of hot coals (or in the gas grill smoking box) just before placing food on the BBQ.

Don't flip foods more than once. Cook over heat, not flame, to prevent flare-ups. Use heat-resistant mitts and long-handled tongs to prevent burns.

Piercing meats with a fork allows juices to escape. Never place cooked food on the same plate that the raw food was on!

Questions? Call the Weber Grill-Line at 1-800-GRILL-OUT (1-800-474-5568). It's open until Labor Day.

Enjoy this recipe I recently created. It's delicious using chicken, tofu, or even veggies.

ORANGE TERIYAKI GRILLED SALMON

4 salmon steaks or fillets (or halibut)
2 tbsp. soya sauce
2 tbsp. orange juice
2 tbsp. orange marmalade
2 tsp. sugar
1 tsp. Oriental sesame oil
1 tbsp. fresh ginger, minced (optional)
¼ tsp. dried basil

Arrange salmon in a single layer in a glass casserole. Combine remaining ingredients; mix well. Pour over fish and marinate at room temperature 30 minutes (or refrigerate up to 2 hours). Preheat BBQ. Remove fish from marinade; reserve leftover marinade. Place fish in a lightly greased grill basket. Grill about 4 inches from heat 3 to 4 minutes per side; baste occasionally. If overcooked, fish will be dry.

Sauce: Bring leftover marinade to a boil. Dissolve 1 tsp. cornstarch in 3 tbsp. orange juice. Stir into boiling mixture. Simmer 2 to 3 minutes, until thickened, stirring often. Drizzle over fish; serve immediately. Delicious over rice.

Note: Boneless chicken breasts take 5 to 7 minutes per side, until juices run clear. Tofu takes 3 to 4 minutes per side, until lightly browned.

The Montreal Jewish community is facing its future with the construction of the Montreal Jewish Community Campus. Who are the faces of the future? It's all of us, including the dozen faces you see here, from five-month Jamie Merling to 69 year-old Henry Ungar. These are the faces that represent the rich diversity of our community and symbolize our hopes and dreams for the future.

Man of Steel

Community cashes in on local businessman's generosity

by Derek Cassoff

Most of us go through life never having met a superhero. And then there's Jack Dym, who had the good fortune of living in the same home as one. His father, Mike, was an underground resistance fighter during the Second World War before immigrating to Canada. In 1958, he started distributing steel out of the back of a pick-up truck, eventually turning his business into Pipe and Piling Supplies Ltd., a leading supplier of steel, with operations across Canada and the United States.

When Mike passed away four years ago, Jack inherited more than the family business. He also picked up his father's devotion to community and his knack for lending a hand to those most in need.

So it is perhaps only fitting, then, that when plans for the Montreal Jewish Community Campus were first announced, Jack rushed to the head of the line with an offer of help. The result? His company has donated all of the structural steel needed to build the Gelber Conference Centre and the fifth floor of Cummings House. Project managers figure it would have cost the Jewish community more than $50,000 on the open market.

"As a Jewish businessman, I have a responsibility to give back to the community that has been so generous to me," Jack said. "I think we have an obligation to support our community, whether it be through money, time or materials."

HOWARD KAY

Sticking to family tradition, Jack kept the gift under wraps until just recently, when he decided that a bit of publicity might lure other businesses into making similar gifts.

"One thing that my dad taught me is that tzedakah is between the giver and the recipient," he said. "My father never liked this sort of publicity. He didn't want his name anywhere." ⊙

A once in a lifetime opportunity... meaningful for even longer

The pride is enormous, the concern constant, the anticipation overwhelming... the Montreal Jewish Community Campus will soon be a reality.

It will provide the most important opportunity for communal service improvement in decades and will enable us to go forward into the next millennium with renewed strength, efficiency and visible commitment to the future.

Each of us can not only play a part in its success, but can tangibly show how much we care about the future of our children and grandchildren in this great Jewish community. The project has already attracted many supporters with gifts from $100 to $1,500,000... Although the dollar amounts are substantially different, each gift is a clear testimony to our confidence in our future.

For many of us, it is the first time that we have been able to participate in such an incredible project, and in such a meaningful way. It is the opportunity to dedicate an entire floor, a room, a mezuzah, or even honour a child or grandchild... and for as little as $100.

It really is the opportunity of a lifetime, to do something important that will last for even more than a lifetime! ⊛

Donors have their say in CJA focus groups

HOWARD KAY

Joel King is hoping for a healthy campaign

Many donors to Combined Jewish Appeal want a greater say over how their money is spent and feel that more dollars should be directed to the poor and the frail elderly. At least those are the initial results of ongoing focus groups being conducted by the Campaign Team as it prepares for the 1999 CJA Campaign.

"Presented with several areas of critical needs, most participants felt that assisting the poor and supporting the frail elderly should receive priority treatment," says Joel King, general chairman of CJA '99. "And people want us to keep focusing on youth retention, which they see as being the biggest challenge facing the Montreal Jewish community."

One plan being formalized would enable CJA donors to direct the increased portion of their future gifts to one of six areas, including assisting the poor, retaining youth in Montreal, supporting Jewish education or rescuing Jews in peril.

The focus groups are part of a plan to receive more feedback from the most important component of any fund-raising campaign – the donors themselves.

"The Campaign leadership always has certain ideas about the Campaign," Joel says. "But we're always looking for the public's input." ⊛

The 1999 Combined Jewish Appeal Campaign will run from August through November. Proceeds raised during the Campaign will benefit the social, cultural, educational, health and welfare needs of Montreal's Jewish community through FEDERATION CJA and its constituent agencies. Funds will also assist with immigrant absorption efforts in Israel and will meet the humanitarian needs of Jews in distressed lands around the world. Last year, the CJA Campaign raised more than $34 million. For more information, call (514) 345-2645, ext. 2600.

Taking it to the max

In her two decades of service as a Jewish community professional, Maxyne Finkelstein never met a challenge she could not overcome. It's something that carried her through her work with Canadian Jewish Congress, the Golden Age Association and FEDERATION CJA, where she most recently served as executive director.

Well, the secret is finally out – and Montreal has graduated one of its best to the ranks of national community service. Maxyne leaves her post this month to accept the job of executive director of UIA Federations of Canada, the national umbrella organization for the Jewish communities in Canada. She will assume the position of executive vice-president in June, 2000.

"Maxyne reflects the best of the Montreal Jewish community. Her intellect, commitment to Jewish values and Menschlichkeit made her one of Montreal's most uniquely-talented and successful community leaders," says Danyael Cantor, executive vice-president of FEDERATION CJA. "Her assuming the highest professional position in the national Jewish system is a tribute to Maxyne and an honour to the Montreal Jewish community."

While Maxyne's new job is based in Toronto, she expects to return frequently to her old home on business or any excuse to catch up with friends and family. ⊛

a capital idea

More than 50 leaders of the Montreal Jewish community took their act on the road, spending a day meeting with members of the provincial government and the official opposition in Quebec City. The Parliamentary Mission was designed to ensure that politicians understand the issues of concern to the community, including healthcare, education and intercultural relations. The delegation met with Premier Lucien Bouchard, Vice-Premier Bernard Landry, Health and Social Services Minister Pauline Marois as well as other cabinet ministers and members of the opposition's Shadow Cabinet. They attended a vin d'honneur and luncheon with Jean-Pierre Charbonneau, the president of the National Assembly, and a cocktail hosted by the Parti Québécois. They dined at the Chateau Frontenac with leaders of the Quebec Liberal Party. The trip was organized by Canadian Jewish Congress and included representatives from FEDERATION CJA, the Communauté Sépharade du Québec and other Jewish community groups. ●

Au revoir Daniel Gal!

HOWARD KAY

Après un mandat de près de cinq ans à Montréal, où il représentait Israël à titre de Consul général pour l'est du Canada, Daniel Gal, et sa femme Jacqueline, se préparent pour leur prochaine affectation. Mais le couple quitte Montréal avec des sentiments mitigés.

"Nous nous sommes attachés à cette ville. Ma femme et moi avons trouvé cette expérience extraordinaire. Nous avons fait la connaissance d'une communauté dynamique avec une richesse d'activités hors pair", de dire le Consul général.

Diplomate chevronné, ayant travaillé en Europe, en Asie et en Afrique, M. Gal dit avoir été particulièrement impressionné par le puissant sentiment d'appartenance de la communauté juive de Montréal envers Israël. Les événements annuels comme la Marche vers Jérusalem, les cérémonies du Yom Hazikaron et la merveilleuse célébration du 50e anniversaire d'Israël l'an dernier en témoignent.

"Selon les Nations Unies, le Canada jouit d'une des meilleures qualités de vie au monde. À Montréal, vous avez l'une des meilleures qualités de vie juive en dehors d'Israël", affirme M. Gal.

Stanley Plotnick, le Président de la FEDERATION CJA, déclare que le départ de M. Gal sera une grande perte pour la communauté juive de Montréal. "Daniel Gal est une personne extraordinaire et il était un excellent Consul. Nous n'avons jamais eu un Consul qui s'impliquait autant dans la vie des juifs montréalais et qui travaillait sans rélâche."

La FEDERATION CJA et tous les membres de la communauté juive de Montréal souhaitent à Daniel et Jacqueline Gal leurs meilleurs voeux de succès dans leurs entreprises à venir – quel que soit le pays où ils se trouvent. ●

What's in a name?

How you can leave a lasting legacy to your community

There aren't too many times in your life when you can leave a lasting and permanent legacy for future generations.

But then there's the Montreal Jewish Community Campus – designed as an enduring symbol of our community's strength and vitality. It's a place to strengthen our values, maintain our identity and keep alive our shared history and culture. And you – yes, you – can participate in turning this dream into reality, no matter how much or how little you can afford.

What better way to leave a lasting legacy for your children and grandchildren than through the various naming opportunities available at several of our agencies and services? You and your family can "purchase" a piece of the Montreal Jewish Community Campus, by donating major assets such as conference rooms and reception areas, or by dedicating a mezuzah through our Dor L'Dor Campaign. Either way, it's a great opportunity to honour a family or perpetuate the memory of a loved one.

KinderLink is a unique, one-time opportunity to add your child or children's names to those of thousands of others as part of a timeline of the history of the Jewish community. What a thrill for them – a piece of history to show off to their own children many years from now. But you have to act now. Once the dust settles – literally – on the Campus project, the opportunities will end. ●

"Our Mom and Dad taught us about the need to get involved in our community and they were always in favour of us contributing in whatever way that we could, financially and time-wise. It was primarily through their encouragement that we discovered the need for a strong Jewish community in Montreal, in Canada and in Israel. It is only fitting then that we dedicate a conference room in honour of our parents in the new Montreal Jewish Community Campus. Our family believes very strongly in the Campus – it's our way of making sure that our community has a home for future generations."

"The new Campus will show young people that we are a viable community that has the best possible facilities. It will be an expression of strength for the future and give them a reason to stay here. My father had a very strong sense of community and of giving back. We have been fortunate in life and we wanted to do something special. My mother and my late father placed great importance on education, so we chose the library because of its educational value."

"My memories of attending Camp Wooden Acres as a child still are dear to me. In 1958, I was a nine-year-old boy who was able to enjoy my summer because of financial aid from the Jewish community. As a camper, I learned to play Capture-the-Flag and Red Rover, and I experienced my first bee sting. Now, I'm in the fortunate position to be able to dedicate the Camp B'nai Brith Boardroom so that another nine-year-old boy can enjoy the great programs. I hope that kids today can benefit in the same way I did. I guess you could say I feel it's payback time."

It shows those of us who have chosen to stay here that Montreal is a very viable community."

Earth-shattering

On Monday, April 12, the earth moved – our community broke ground on the future site of the Montreal Jewish Community Campus.

We would have never made it to this point without the generous support of our partners – the federal, provincial and municipal governments as well as Hydro-Québec and the incredible support of some of the leading families of the Montreal Jewish community.

We owe a big thank you to those families who have come on board the project as major sponsors – the Bronfman family; the Cummings family; the Nahum Gelber family; Marlene and Joel King; Beatrice Medicoff and Marion Schneiderman; Leanor and Alvin Segal; and Christine and Herschel Victor.

We look forward to welcoming everyone to our new home – your new home – when we open our doors in the fall.

Installing a Mezuzah on a doorpost is one of the most enduring symbols of our connection to our past. Here are five people who have done just that.

As chairman of Combined Jewish Appeal's marketing task force the last several years, Mark Sherman has certainly left his imprint on the Montreal Jewish community. Now he and his family will leave a lasting mark with a Mezuzah gracing the front door of the Communications Department.

"For our family, this was a great way to participate in the Montreal Jewish Community Campus project, our way to leave a lasting contribution to the community. Fundraising campaigns of this magnitude usually focus on big donations and big gifts. This was our opportunity to make a meaningful contribution within our means."

"I feel a sense of responsibility. I am fortunate to have achieved some success in life and I have to give something back to the community. The Campus project is an important one and if we don't keep this community vibrant, we are destined to lose it. I hope we can have an impact on other people's lives and teach our kids to be active members of the community."

Michael Flinker is one of those people who has not forgotten his roots. Along with his wife, Dr. Marcia Gillman, he will be donating a Mezuzah to be hung outside the ProMontreal Department on the new Campus premises.

You don't have to tell Shlomo Shimon about the importance of Jewish education. He is the executive director of FEDERATION CJA's Jewish Education Council and, along with his wife Tova, who also works at the JEC, will dedicate two Mezuzot for the JEC offices.

"We spend endless hours in these offices, so they feel like our home and what better place to hang a Mezuzah than outside of your own home? We also want to show appreciation to the many volunteers who dedicate their efforts to the community and to the selfless professionals who give of their time and talents. Without this leadership, we couldn't do what we do today."

« Nous voulons que la mezzouzah soit placée là où elle sera la plus bénéfique. Une mezzouzah est un symbole religieux, et les Juifs ont la responsabilité de s'acquitter de tâches à la fois religieuses et sociales. Dans le Campus, l'engagement social sera jumelé à la responsabilité religieuse. J'espère aussi que mes enfants verront la mezzouzah que nous avons achetée pour qu'ils soient motivés à s'engager à la communauté. »

Sylvain Abitbol et sa femme, Gilda, ne sont certainement pas des donateurs difficiles. Peu importe l'emplacement de la mezzouzah qu'ils ont achetée, pourvu qu'ils puissent appuyer par son entremise un projet regroupant une vaste gamme de services sous un seul toit qui sans aucun doute profitera à la communauté sépharade.

Renee and Marty Lieberman have been involved in so many aspects of Jewish community life that a Mezuzah in their honour would have fit in well just about anywhere on the Montreal Jewish Community Campus. But for them, the decision was obvious – they chose to purchase a Mezuzah for the Memorial Room in the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre.

"We wanted our children and future generations never to forget the Holocaust and to remember our victory over Hitler by showing that Jewish life goes on," Renee says. "Children should feel the importance of visiting the area and know that as a community, we must stand together. Educating children is the key to our survival. It provides strong roots for the future and a sense of unity. As a community, Montreal has a bright future and the new Campus will be indicative of this strength."

We even have something for the little ones...

HOWARD KAY

Barbara Plotnick, chair of KinderLink, with two of her three grandchildren, whose names will be inscribed on the Timeline of Jewish History.

The Montreal Jewish Community Campus is about the future – the future growth and future vitality of our community here in Montreal. And what better way is there to celebrate this commitment than by paying tribute to the children of the Montreal Jewish community?

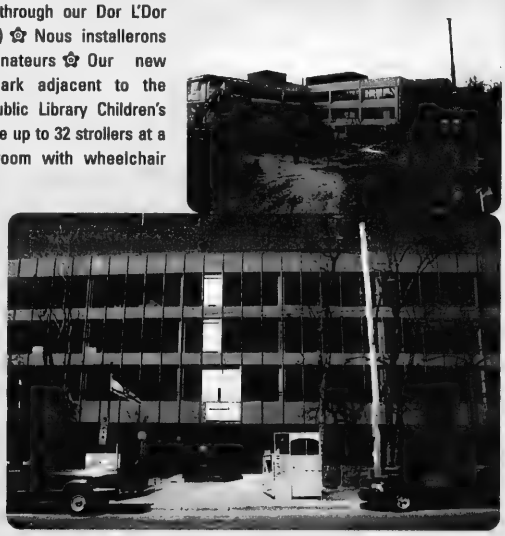
Imagine a timeline of Jewish history on the fifth floor of Cummings House inscribed with the names of our community's children and grandchildren. That's 150 linear feet of names, celebrating the rich and diverse make-up of our city and our community. We're calling it KinderLink, for the true essence of this project is to link together all our children. Their hopes and dreams will help shape the unfolding story of the Jewish people and will honour our past, celebrate our present and invigorate our future.

How does it work? It's simple. For a small gift of $100, you can have the name of one child or grandchild, 18 or under, inscribed on the Timeline of Jewish History. Two names go for $180, three or more for the maximum donation of $250. Payment can be made by cheque or credit card. ⊛

For more information on KinderLink, call Andrea Freedman at (514) 345-2645, ext. 3245. You can also contact Andrea by e-mail at afreems@total.net

It's a matter of fact...

It's nothing but a cavernous shell right now, but when complete, the Montreal Jewish Community Campus will incorporate 250,000 square feet of new facilities and 89,000 square feet of renovated space ✡ Nous utilisons plus de 56 tonnes de métal ✡ nous nous attendons à ce que les travailleurs mettent plus de 84,000 heures de plus avant la fin du mois d'août ✡ Once we open, we expect 2,000 people a day to enter the North Campus each day ✡ We will have 318 doorways in Cummings House and the Gelber Conference Centre (that means 318 opportunities to buy a Mezuzah through our Dor L'Dor Campaign) ✡ Nous installerons 273 ordinateurs ✡ Our new stroller park adjacent to the Jewish Public Library Children's Library will be able to accommodate up to 32 strollers at a time ✡ Looking for a washroom with wheelchair accessibility? We'll have four.



a March for the ages

Beautiful sunshine and warm temperatures were the operative words as 20,000 people took part in the 27th annual March to Jerusalem, walking, cycling and in-line skating 19 kilometres through city streets. Afterwards, thousands absorbed Israeli culture and refreshments at the YM-YWHA Israeli Street Festival at the Cavendish Mall.

A match made in cyberspace

Steve Robins admits he was skeptical at first. It's not every day that you receive e-mail from someone purporting to be your long-lost second cousin. But that's exactly what Meir Raz insisted he was in his electronic message from Israel.

An engineer from Haifa, Meir always knew he had relatives in Montreal. His grandmother had made aliyah to Israel from eastern Europe, but other siblings had embarked for Canada instead, leaving a gaping hole in the family tree. The gap began to fill when Meir stumbled across FEDERATION CJA's website – federationcja.org – and sent an e-mail to the webmaster, Judith Leichter, with the names of his relatives. Using the phonebook and Combined Jewish Appeal's donor lists, Judith contacted the relatives and eventually put Meir in touch with Steve.

"At first, I was hesitant. I wanted more proof that we were cousins," Steve said. "But once we figured it out for sure, each e-mail became friendlier and friendlier and we learned a lot about each other and our families."

SHERYL ANN MEDOFF

Surf's up at the Robin's family nest

The new relationship hit a peak early last month when the two cousins met in person. Meir was making one of his frequent business trips to Seattle and instead of taking his traditional flight through New York, he flew through Dorval instead, stopping over for 36 hours. The two spent just about every moment together.

"It's a Jewish miracle made in cyberspace," says Elaine Goldstein, who spearheaded the launch of FEDERATION CJA's website two years ago. The site receives more than 50 visitors every day, including requests for information from as far away as Russia and New Zealand. ⊙ a stable environment

by Derek Cassoff

It's funny how the smallest events in one's life often make the biggest difference. For George Kis, his foray into volunteerism began after reading a magazine article that espoused the virtues of horseback riding for children with physical and intellectual handicaps. Turns out the simple activity, taken for granted by so many, is one of the best ways to stimulate the minds and muscles of children.

George owns a pair of horses that he keeps at a stable in St. Lazare, so the connection was obvious. "I figured, I have access to horses and I know what to do around them," he said. "It would be a shame for me not to do anything."

Once a week, a group of children and young adults from Miriam Home foster homes comes out to the stable, where George and friend Danny Rapp take them on horseback along forested trails.

George's efforts were recently recognized by the Quebec government with a prestigious volunteer award, but he says no award could ever overshadow the joy he gets from watching the smiles form across the kids' faces.

"Some of the kids are amazing; they're not afraid. They have no inhibitions," he says. "One kid spends the entire week in a wheelchair, but when we put him on a horse, nothing holds him back." ⊙

Miriam Home and Services is one of the public health establishments supported by FEDERATION CJA. The agency operates 20 community residences for the intellectually handicapped, as well as a supported employment program. For more information, call (450) 681-9256. George Kis is always looking for volunteers to help with his program. If you would like to help, call George at (514) 381-4201.

Un engagement sans frontières

Une bénévole récolte des fonds au profit des aînés en Israël

par Julie Lesser

Joyce Deitcher se décrit comme une citoyenne du monde. De l'autre côté du globe, un groupe d'aînés à Jérusalem est chanceux de pouvoir bénéficier de sa compassion et de son dévouement hors pair.

Depuis les neuf dernières années, Joyce assure la présidence d'Amit, un organisme international qui récolte des fonds au profit d'aînés en perte d'autonomie et d'infirmes à Jérusalem.

"Ces personnes ont besoin d'aide," de dire Joyce, qui prépare actuellement la campagne de financement d'Amit. "Nous voulons améliorer leur qualité de vie et nous assurer qu'elles ne sont pas isolées. C'est important d'appuyer les programmes pour les aînés, quel que soit leur pays de résidence, et comme sioniste, Israël me tient à coeur".

Les fonds récoltés dans les communautés juives à l'échelle mondiale permettent de financer une foule de services, dont le transport, des activités sociales et des programmes pour combattre la violence à l'endroit des aînés. Les minibus achetés par Amit offrent aux participants la possibilité de se rendre à leur rendez-vous médicaux et de jouir de sorties agréables. Une fois par semaine, un hôtel à Jérusalem offre un déjeuner gratuit aux membres d'Amit. Les bénévoles sont formés pour reconnaître les signes de violence à l'égard des aînés et assistent régulièrement à des ateliers pour se perfectionner.

À Jérusalem, un concert printanier annuel est offert aux membres d'Amit et aux étudiants du secondaire pour rapprocher les générations. "L'objectif de ce programme de musique est d'établir des liens entre les jeunes et les aînés," explique Joyce. "Les jeunes peuvent ainsi mieux comprendre ce que cela signifie de ne plus avoir l'énergie de la jeunesse". ⊙

La campagne de souscription d'Amit est chapeautée par l'Association culturelle juive, une initiative de la FEDERATION CJA. Depuis 1973, l'Association culturelle juive a recueilli plus de 3 millions de dollars pour appuyer des programmes en Israël et consolider l'identité juive des jeunes Montréalais. Pour de plus amples renseignements, appeler au (514) 345-2645, poste 6440.

Canadians rally for jailed Iranian Jews

By DAVID LAZARUS, PAUL LUNGEN & BEN ROSE
Staff Reporters

Jews from across Canada gathered last weekend to show support for 13 Iranian Jews being held on espionage charges, and to send a message to Iran's Islamic government that their brethren have not been forgotten.

In a hastily convened rally in Toronto, about 500 people gathered at the Leah Posluns Theatre to hear community representatives pledge solidarity with the imprisoned Jews and to urge Iran to drop the spying charges.

Liberal MP Jim Peterson told the overflow crowd that Canada is following events in Iran closely, and that Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy has voiced Canada's concerns about the upcoming trials directly to the Iranian ambassador in Ottawa.

Representatives of the Roman Catholic, Anglican and United Churches joined the Jewish community at the rally, as did members of the Baha'i and Zoroastrian faiths, officials of the Canadian-Polish Congress and MPPs Monte Kwinter and David Young.

Dr. Mohammad Ashraf, director general of the Islamic Society of North America, represented the Muslim community. Ashraf told The CJN that "any trial of any person in any country should be fair and open…Islam stands for justice and justice is the same for everybody. They should not be prosecuted because they are Jewish."

The Iranian Embassy in Ottawa, the only one in North America, is no doubt monitoring the Canadian reaction to events in Iran and is likely "using it as a barometer" of world reaction, said Keith Landy, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region. Congress and the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto co-sponsored the rally.

Jews in Canada are united behind their co-religionists in Iran, Landy said. "We remain united, committed, a single world community. When one of us is threatened, all of us are threatened."

"We are here to expose anti-Semitism in Iran disguised by judicial jargon," said Alan Sandler, the newly elected president of UJA Federation. "We are here because for us, silence itself would be criminal."

Peterson said Canada is watching the situation in Iran very closely. The arrested Iranian Jews "appear to be victims of a cynical power play" by conservative forces in Iran. Those forces seek to undermine the reforms and rapprochement with the west engineered by Iranian president Mohammad Khatami.

OTTAWA — Linda Nadolny Cogan of Ottawa was recently awarded the International Women's Division Award of Excellence from Keren Hayesod/United Israel Appeal in Jerusalem. The award recognizes outstanding contributions to national and international Jewish life.

UW Boosts Funding

TORONTO — The United Way of Greater Toronto has announced a $1.5 million increase in funding to 55 member agencies. The increases are a result of United Way's 1998 campaign, which raised over $60 million. Four Jewish organizations will also see their United Way allotments boosted. The Bloor Jewish Community Centre will receive an additional $1,988 to cover salaries and administrative costs; Jewish Family & Child Service will get an extra $25,295 to provide four additional groups a year for abused women, their children and their batterers; Jewish Vocational Services will receive a $5,000 increase to enhance staffing; and the Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa will receive a $12,870 grant for each of the next two years.

Holocaust Symposium

GRANDE PRAIRIE — A Holocaust symposium organized by the Jewish Federation of Edmonton held here recently attracted more than 450 students. The one-day program took place at Grande Prairie Regional College and attracted Grade 12 students from the city's three public and Catholic high schools, as well as six other schools from within a 120 kilometre radius of the city.

ISRAEL

Secret Pullout Deal?

JERUSALEM — Defeated Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu initially agreed, in secret talks with Syria, to a full withdrawal from the Golan Heights to the pre-1967 border, according to an article in last week's issue of the New Republic magazine. In turn, Syria agreed to a single six-mile demilitarized zone and to an international monitoring station on the Golan, Mideast expert Daniel Pipes wrote, citing "several sources with first-hand knowledge" of the 1998 talks. Netanyahu, who denied the report, ultimately balked at signing the accord after his defence and foreign ministers refused to endorse it.

WORLD

Jewish Officer Released

MOSCOW — A Jewish officer in the Russian army who was kidnapped last year in the breakaway republic of Chechnya has been freed in a prisoner swap. After his release, Lt. Sergei Fishman, 25, said his kidnappers had tortured him, singling him out for especially harsh treatment because of his religion.

Embassy Move Blocked

WASHINGTON — President Bill Clinton has blocked the move of the U.S. Embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. As expected, Clinton invoked his authority to stop the move based on the "national security" interests of the United States. A group of senators plans to introduce legislation to revoke Clinton's ability to renew the waiver when it expires in six months.

Jews Laud Poland

NEW YORK — Poland should be commended for passing legislation to create protective zones around former Nazi concentration camps in the country, a coalition of international Jewish groups agreed during a recent meeting. The coalition, which includes groups from the United States, Israel and Europe, also agreed to resume discussion with the Polish government concerning the preservation of the site of the Auschwitz and Birkenau camps.

Rebbe's Death Marked

NEW YORK — Thousands of pilgrims visited the New York grave of Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson last month to mark the fifth anniversary of the Lubavitcher Rebbe's death. Thousands of other followers of the Rebbe around the world also marked the anniversary with commemorations.

Jews Blamed For NATO Bombing

ATHENS — Jews were responsible for NATO's shelling of Yugoslavia, according to a statement circulated among students in the northern Greek city of Salonika.

The accusation, which surfaced periodically during the bombing campaign, prompted the concern of Greek and Yugoslav Jews.

At the University of Salonika, the accusation was attributed to the school's Socialist Student Movement.

It alleged that "Jewish Zionists are controlling world developments through the Masonic lodges and associations they have created around the world."

It also stated that U.S. Jews created the Monica Lewinsky scandal and used it to blackmail Clinton into taking action against Yugoslavia.

The accusations drew swift condemnation from the Central Jewish Board of Greece, which sent a letter of protest to the ruling Socialist party, and demanded the statement be retracted.

Last week, the national Socialist Youth Movement issued a statement that the accusations were the work of a "single individual who acted wrongly and unacceptably."

Canada seeks to postpone territories conference

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada is trying to postpone a controversial conference on territories occupied by Israel after 1967 – just five months after it voted to have the conference.

Canada is working with Switzerland "to seek an indefinite postponement" of the international conference, scheduled to take place in Geneva July 15, Michael O'Shaughnessy, a spokesperson for the Foreign Affairs ministry, told The CJN.

The unprecedented meeting is designed to examine how the post-World War II Geneva Conventions governing civilians can be applied to the West Bank, Gaza Strip and eastern Jerusalem – areas Israel occupied following the 1967 Six Day War.

"In current circumstances, the convening of the conference would be unhelpful for the peace process," O'Shaughnessy said. In the event the conference does go ahead as scheduled, Canada would then consider whether or not to attend, he added.

Ottawa is trying to postpone the worldwide gathering, "because of the highly politicized nature of the conference," O'Shaughnessy said, refusing to elaborate on why Canada would work to put off the meeting when it voted for it.

The development comes just five months after Canada, in a move that was blasted by Jewish groups, voted at the United Nations to have the conference take place.

Meeting in a rare emergency special session in early February, the UN called for an international conference to ensure that the conventions are respected in areas still under Israeli control, and that their ban on settlements is implemented.

The Arab-sponsored resolution passed by a vote of 115 to 2. Only the United States joined Israel in opposing the motion. There were five abstentions, and 36 member nations were absent for the vote.

The non-binding motion called for the 188 signatories to the 1949 Fourth Geneva Convention, which governs treatment of civilians in occupied lands during wartime, to discuss "measures to enforce the convention in the occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem."

Ottawa voted for the resolution, despite publicly stated misgivings about its language and how it was brought forward.

Slammed by Jewish organizations

Canada's support for the motion was condemned by national Jewish organizations, who argued that Ottawa was undermining its own role in the peace process, as well as contributing to the violation of the Oslo Accords, which contain mechanisms for resolving Israeli-Palestinian disputes.

Israel condemned the motion in the strongest terms, and pointed out that a conference on Israeli treatment of civilians in occupied lands made no sense, given that 97 percent of Palestinians in those areas now live under Palestinian rule.

Analysts have pointed out that the resolution could have been the result of continued Arab anger over Israel's controversial Har Choma housing project in a Jerusalem suburb.

A few weeks ago, U.S. Vice-President Al Gore announced that the United States would boycott the meeting.

"The conference is a badly disguised attempt to single out Israel for criticism," Gore said.

A statement from Israel's embassy in Ottawa said Jerusalem believes it is "especially absurd" to hold the conference, as it would take place just days after the establishment of the new government of Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak, which has made the renewal of the peace process a priority.

Israel, said the embassy, "appreciates" the efforts of countries to postpone the conference, which would have a detrimental impact on the peace process and was passed out of "narrow political motives, and not humanitarian considerations."

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) said it was pleased with Canada's efforts to postpone the meeting, and with the government's receptiveness to the arguments the CIC advanced.

Canada did not attend a pre-conference meeting held in Cairo last month, the CIC pointed out.

UN Watch, a Geneva-based, independent monitor of the United Nations, observed recently that not once in the past 50 years has the Fourth Geneva Convention been invoked against a state.

It added that the timing of the conference would undermine peace initiatives of the new Israeli government.

Pidyon Shvuyim!

The full extent of the danger facing the 13 Jews who are locked in an Iranian jail, falsely accused of spying for Israel, is only now settling into our consciousness.

With the first announcement, nearly three weeks ago, of their arrest and incarceration in January, February and March, there was a sense of incredulity that any government anywhere on earth, in this day and age, would officially engage in such medieval behavior towards its own citizens.

But that incredulity quickly dissipated into anger; and that anger has evolved into a steel-hard resolve to do whatever we can to help secure the release of these unfortunate men.

Throughout the civilized world, governments, non-government organizations and a wide, multi-faith coalition of clergy have condemned the brazenly evil hostage-taking policies of the Iranian regime.

In keeping with the millennia-old obligation of pidyon shvuyim, the redemption of prisoners, Jewish communities in the Diaspora and in Israel are mobilizing to help try to bring about the release of the "thirteen."

Beginning last week, continuing through Friday, in synagogues on Shabbat, and then on Sunday and Monday in the major communities of Canada, people gathered in large numbers to protest the actions of Tehran.

In addressing the Sunday night rally in Toronto, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region chair, Keith Landy, poignantly prescribed the next set of steps that we must follow if we are to be of any help to the hostages.

"It is critical that in the face of events like these, we stand united as a community, Jew and non-Jew alike, loudly asserting the universality of every Jew's basic human rights."

The postcard inserted in this column was distributed to the people who attended the rally in Toronto on Sunday evening. It is addressed to the president of Iran.

We urge all CJN readers to set aside a few moments to clip it out of the paper and mail it the government of Iran at the address listed below. It is the very least we can do; and we are only at the beginning of the things that we must do.

His Excellency Hojjatoleslam val Moslemin Sayed Mohammad Khatami, President, The Islamic Republic of Iran
c/o His Excellency Seyed Mohammad Hossein Adeli, Ambassador of the Islamic Republic of Iran

245 Metcalfe Street,
Ottawa, Ont.
K2P 2K2.

We must all act. MBD

נפשי בשאלתי ועמי בבקשתי

For my life grant my request, For my people grant my petition.
Esther (Hadassah), Chapter 7, Verse 3.

Dear Mr. President:

The Islamic Republic of Iran is a glorious civilization with a long history. As you know, generations of Iranian Jews have contributed to this proud heritage and have been an integral and vibrant part of Iranian culture.

I ask that you honour your government's commitment to protecting and securing Iran's longstanding Jewish community by immediately releasing those Jews falsely imprisoned on espionage charges.

These prisoners must be permitted immediate visits by their families and representatives of the International Red Cross. Everything necessary must be done to ensure their speedy release and it is imperative that the rights of these prisoners be guaranteed, as must the human rights of all religious minorities.

As King Artaxerxes accepted Queen Hadassah's petition on behalf of her people centuries ago, please accept our petition on behalf of our innocent brothers.

Mr. President, the eyes of the world are upon you, let my people go!

UJA-Federation program aims to help survivors

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A UJA Federation agency has initiated a four-pronged program to help elderly Holocaust survivors.

The program, created by volunteers at the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre, focuses on the material needs of survivors as well as their emotional well-being, said Michael Herman, chair of the centre.

Its four components include publishing a booklet to aid in making restitution claims; sensitizing staff in hospital and senior care facilities to the particular needs of survivors; providing home visits; and recording the memoirs of Holocaust survivors.

The process of applying for benefits from European countries "can be pretty daunting for elderly survivors," Herman said. "We walk them through the process and make sure they are talking to the right people, the right restitution group."

Craig Rimer, a centre volunteer, developed the booklet that summarizes the criteria and process for claimants who wish to benefit from restitution funds, Herman said. Two hundred copies have already been distributed with plans to print more.

The 13-page booklet outlines the programs offered by seven European governments and provides contact names, addresses and phone numbers for further inquiries.

"We have prepared this booklet as a partial attempt to deal with [the problems of confusion and misinformation] and to assist claimants in advancing their cases," Rimer said.

Those people with access to the Internet are advised to check the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum's Web site at www.ushmm.org/assets/home.html. That site contains "the best and most comprehensive source of information" on restitution and compensation, Rimer said.

Volunteers have also begun to train staff in geriatric centres to make them aware of unique issues involving survivors who are experiencing dementia.

"When some people get older, they may get delusional and they revert to their experiences of 50 years earlier," Herman said. Innocuous noises, like bells, showers, shaving, can bring back memories associated with those sounds. "They're laying in bed and they think they're in the camp," Herman said.

Volunteers are also being recruited to visit survivors in their homes to provide "chauffeuring, grocery shopping and just to sit with them," Herman continued.

Finally, the centre is asking survivors who wish to record their experiences to come forward. Volunteers will help record their memories and may even ghost-write their stories for them, he said.

Herman said the centre's program developed out of a meeting a little while ago. "We sat down and we said, 'the survivors will not be with us that much longer. Are we doing enough for them?'"

The centre's executive brainstormed and came up with the four-part plan. About 12 of the centre's 200 volunteers are taking part in the new program. Many of them are 30-something professionals who don't have relatives who lived through the Holocaust, but who wish to bring their skills to bear in projects that will help improve survivors' quality of life, he said.

For more information, contact the centre at (416) 631-5689 or e-mail at holmem@ujafed.org.

Outdoor projects help give BJC new lease on life

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rescued from bankruptcy four years ago, the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC), formerly part of the Jewish Community Centre, is enjoying a new lease on life with a $300,000 outdoor construction program financed entirely by donors.

In the plans as well over the next two to five years are a new aquatic centre, including an indoor-outdoor pool, and a new lobby, these projects to be financed jointly by BJC and the capital funds from UJA Federation.

The earth-moving trucks and bulldozers are racing to complete the extensive relocation of the BJC outdoor facilities by July 5.

"We're very excited to improve services for 800 campers and BJC members," said executive director Deborah Pinsky.

"We've agreed, starting in 2000, to set up a fund that in 10 years will pay the donors back. We're hoping that this money will be used for emergency repairs."

The new facilities include a baseball diamond, a soccer field, an in-line skating surface on two of the unused tennis courts, tents, a renovated clubhouse for campers, and two outdoor change cabins for campers. Showers in an outdoor pool area will be enlarged by 20 percent.

The extra pool area was made available when the back area of the road leading to the Lipa Green building was upgraded and realigned to allow the pool fence to be moved back.

Moving the road also provided 14 new parking spaces on BJC land and four new spaces in the Lipa Green lot.

A slightly shorter new outdoor track is already in operation.

New playground equipment for the early childhood program this summer will be installed by July 5.

One of the few indoor changes involves installation of a climbing wall in one of the courts now used for racquetball. It will be for campers in the summer and members in the fall.

Phase 2, to be completed in two or three years, includes air conditioning for two more gyms and new playground equipment for the school, in addition to the new aquatic centre.

Phase 3, probably five years away, includes a new lobby with escalators leading to different BJC areas.

Young named

TORONTO — David Young, one of three Jewish MPPs elected in last month's provincial election, has been named by Premier Mike Harris as parliamentary secretary to education minister Janet Ecker.

Young, who was elected in Willowdale, will serve as a sort of understudy to the minister.

As well, Tina Molinari, who represents the heavily Jewish riding of Thornhill, was named as parliamentary secretary to Dianne Cunningham, the new minister of colleges of universities.

Canada 3000 grounds charge for special meals

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada 3000 has put the air brakes on its plan to charge a fee for special in-flight meals.

The charter airline announced last week that its board of directors had reversed the previously announced policy of charging $10 for kosher, vegetarian, diabetic, halal and other special meals. That policy was implemented on May 1 and rescinded on June 21.

In a letter to Manuel Prutschi, national director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, Canada 3000 president Angus Kinnear stated, "The board took note of your comments and has decided to withdraw the special meal charge." The airline also sent a notice to travel agents informing them of the decision.

Congress had been in the forefront of a broad-based campaign by community and religious organizations that called on Canada 3000 to rescind the special meal charge. The coalition included Seventh Day Adventists and the Vietnamese-Buddhist Association, whose members require vegetarian meals, as well as the Canadian Islamic Congress.

"We are pleased that Canada 3000 took the courageous step to review a policy in response to the widespread public concern," Prutschi said. "I think it was bad public relations for them and they realized that when the other carriers were open in indicating they had no intention of adopting that policy. They saw it as part of the standard service provided to passengers."

Congress brought the various groups together to add weight to the protest, Prutschi said.

"It is a heartening sign that when groups work together in a principled cause, the ultimate result is success," he added.

Ontario court facing unique kosher conundrum

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Ontario Superior Court of Justice has reserved a decision on a motion by three rabbis to have a lawsuit against them removed from the secular court.

Levitts Kosher Foods Inc. is suing the three rabbis for libel and slander, for inducing breach of contract, and for restraint of trade. The case arose out of the refusal by the Kashruth Council of Toronto (COR) to allow the sale of Levitts fresh kosher meat in establishments under its supervision.

After three days of legal arguments, Madam Justice Mary Lou Benotto, who is hearing the case, said that she would rule on the motion in early July.

Because COR, as an unincorporated body cannot be sued, Levitts is seeking damages from Rabbi Yitzchok Kerzner, chair of the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth; Rabbi Mordechai Levin, executive director of the Kashruth Council; and Rabbi Avrohom Lowinger, chief mashgiach of the council.

Joel Richler, lawyer for the rabbis, argued that the court should not, and does not have the necessary expertise to rule on matters which are intrinsically religious in nature.

Richler said that since Levitts is under the kashrut supervision of the Montreal Vaad Ha'Ir (MK), it is bound by the Shulchan Aruch, the code of Jewish law, which stipulates that controversies be dealt with before a beth din, a rabbinical court.

Levitts' lawyer David Hager, who prefaced his remarks by acknowledging that as a Jew, the case "brings me no joy," said that the charges are economic and civil in nature, and concern matters of Canadian law, particularly the Competition Act.

While Levitts packaged meats, such as hot dogs and salamis, are allowed to be sold in COR-supervised establishments, fresh meat is not. Richler said that no one questions the fact that Levitts meats under the supervision of the Vaad Ha'Ir of Montreal, are kosher. However, he explained that the products do not meet COR's standards of kashrut, which include the stipulation that the owners be shomrei Shabbat, Sabbath observant.

The shomer Shabbat regulation has been in force since 1985, due, Richler said, to the increasing consumer demand for greater strictness in kashrut. This is not only true for COR, he said, but for such supervisory bodies as O-U (the Orthodox Union), the London, England Beth Din and MK.

Since it was recognized that this change in requirements would cause great hardship to companies already under supervision, those businesses which had been kosher under the old rules, and had demonstrated exemplary adherence to kashrut, would not be affected.

This is what happened with Levitts in Montreal, Richler said. (While the original owners, the Levitt family, were shomrei Shabbat, the current owners, Morton Katz and Murray Brookman, are not.)

As a result, COR sent letters to mashgichim and kosher establishments ordering that Levitts fresh meat not be used in establishments they supervise. COR warned that these establishments could lose their hechshers if they don't comply, and insisted that meat already purchased be returned by the establishments to Levitts.

Richler said that this action is strictly in accordance with COR's halachic responsibilities and obligations.

Hager said the action resulted in significant financial loss to the company, and unfairly restricted its business opportunities in Ontario.

Hager alleged that COR's actions could be attributed less to Halachah and more to the council's desire to protect local slaughterers.

While denying that Levitts had any desire to question COR's halachic competence, Hager argued that these matters are not governed by Halachah, but by Canadian law, and should, therefore, be dealt with by a Canadian court.

Hager also objected to the fact that the rabbis had taken the matter to a beth din before the motion was even heard. Levitts takes the position that if the court rules that the case should be heard by a rabbinic court, it would be willing to attend.

A beth din is composed of three rabbis. Each of the two parties involved chooses one, and those two rabbis choose a third.

Richler asserted that no matter what the issues are, they should be dealt with in a beth din.

The CJN will continue to follow the case.

Food company defaced with anti-Semitic graffiti

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Workers at Levitts Kosher Foods Inc. in Montreal were shocked when they arrived at work on June 14. They discovered anti-Semitic graffiti scrawled on their Ste. Dominique Street storefront.

But an even greater shock came in the days to come.

The graffiti – a Nazi swastika and the infamous Auschwitz death camp slogan, Arbeit macht frei – reappeared the next day, two days later, and again after the weekend, despite the application of a fresh coat of paint on the wall after each incident.

"We're upset," said Steven Brookman, Levitts' vice-president of production. He's worked for 12 years in the family business co-owned by his father Murray, who took over the 60-year-old Montreal institution from the Levitt family years ago.

"This is the first time since I've worked here that something like this has happened."

"I'm 31 years old. I've heard about these things, seen it and studied it. But never had to face it head-on.

"At first I sloughed it off, but when it happened for three, four days, you have to do something."

A Nazi swastika and the phrase, Arbeit macht frei, are scrawled on the wall of Levitts Kosher Foods Inc. in Montreal.

According to Carlos Mota, Levitts' general manager and a 15-year employee – he discovered the initial graffiti – a neighbor in the area saw an individual skulking about the business' premises and called police.

Mota said the police, who promised to patrol the area more rigorously, filed a report, but did not have any clues as to who the culprit is.

According to B'nai Brith Quebec director Robert Libman, who was in contact with the Brookmans and police, there were some initial suspicions revolving around an individual in the neighborhood who'd been hurling anti-Semitic remarks at Levitts workers.

David Birnbaum, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), has also been in contact with the Brookmans and police. He said the vandalism was "very troublesome," but cautioned that it would amount to a "big leap," to see it as anything other than an isolated incident.

Brookman, for his part, said the the family business plans to relocate within the next year, because it had outgrown its current premises.

It had nothing to do with the vandalism, he said.

"I'm not going to put up cameras. Yeah, it hurts, but what can I do about it?"

Apotex home scheduled to open in five months

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The state of the art Apotex Jewish Home for the Aged will open in January 2000, said Stephen Herbert, president and CEO of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care (BCGC).

Herbert was speaking at the first joint annual general meeting of BCGC and the Baycrest Centre Foundation (BCF), held recently at the Wagman Centre.

On the financial side, the centre reported an operational deficit of $365,000 on the year's operations ending March 31, much less than the budgeted deficit of $1,705,000 and the deficit of $878,000 last year.

The foundation raised $10.1 million this year, its president Elaine Todres reported, a half-million above target, in what she described "as an incredibly competitive field."

Foundation treasurer Howard Henry said it had $81 million in total assets, with $77 million invested.

The future goal of the centre is "to reach out and reach north," said Herbert, pointing out that it already offers exercises, discussion groups and shopping help to seniors in nine apartment buildings in the vicinity.

In York Region, it has established services in Unionville, and under an agreement with Orillia Soldiers' Memorial Hospital, now has services in nine different communities, Herbert said.

A total of 1,100 people are on the Baycrest Centre waiting list for admission. Construction will begin in September on 2 Neptune Court, the building sponsored by Baycrest, Herbert said.

After the new Jewish Home for the Aged building is done, "we will keep our hard hats on to build two 120-bed nursing homes, one in Toronto and one in York Region," he said.

"If we were a private corporation our shares would be blue chip," he commented.

Todres said the new Baycrest Call Centre, which is also in the planning stage, will make Baycrest an important source for geriatric information in Ontario.

As the Call Centre becomes better known, it will enable Baycrest to reach out to new contributors outside the Jewish community and attract new corporate support, she added.

The Women's Auxiliary raised in excess of $600,000 last year and has almost reached its $5 million pledge to the new home, auxiliary president Mimi Greenspoon said.

"We've sold 900 mezuzahs for the new building, and we say keep building and we'll keep supplying the mezuzahs."

The Mother's Day run for Baycrest raised 45 percent more than last year, and it is expected the Men's Service Group will raise $250,000 in the next 12 months, said president Irwin Wortsman.

Others taking part in the meeting were Marvin Sadowski, Baycrest Centre board chair; Florence Minz Geneen, immediate past chair; and Leo Fine, chair of the foundation board. Fine and Sadowski were re-elected to their positions, as were Todres and Herbert.

Rudy Bratty and Wilfred Posluns were named new members of the Baycrest Centre board, while Susan Fenwick and Robert Van Reekum became ex officio directors.

Florence Brill, Judy Engel, Susan Fenwick and Avra Goldhar were added to the foundation board.

Among those named as new governors of the Baycrest Centre were Faye Corbin, Bernard Dickens, Gail Donner, Arthur Fish, Susan Harris, Mark Henkelman, Susan Himel, David Kassie, Donna Kaufman, Barbara MacDougall, Anthony Melman, Irv Nyman and Cecil Yip.

Kosher sex proves funny

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The several hundred people who came to hear Rabbi Shmuel Boteach, author of the controversial book Kosher Sex, expecting (or hoping) to get a how-to lecture were disappointed.

What they got was a hilarious discussion of sexuality, based entirely on Torah principles.

Rabbi Boteach was speaking at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue at a program sponsored by the community outreach and new leadership committees of Jewish National Fund of Toronto.

Everyone, he said, "needs one person to make you feel that you are more important than the greatest pop star."

After three weeks of marriage, Rabbi Boteach said, "the passion is gone. We go from making each other's blood boil, to making each other sick."

Following the halachic and talmudic rules for the relationship between husband and wife, he said, reverses this tendency.

Couples today want their spouse to be, at the same time, their lover and their best friend, he said. This is impossible, Rabbi Boteach insisted, because it presupposes the co-existence of "skin tingling and predictability, spontaneity and routine. It's like fire and water – they can't co-exist."

That is one of the benefits of observing the laws of family purity, which forbid physical contact during a woman's menstrual period and for seven days afterwards.

"You are lovers for two weeks, and best friends for two weeks. It allows [sexual] desire to rebuild."

On the other hand, the rabbi said, people aren't really looking for love from their spouse. "Our parents have to love us. We want to be special."

To love, he said, is to be incapable of comparing the loved one to anyone else. To you, the one you love is more perfect, more beautiful, more special, he said.

"The essence of sex is to connect, to become one flesh," he said. In the Bible, he explained, sex is considered the highest form of knowledge. That is the purpose of intimacy, he said, to truly "know" someone.

He urged romantic gestures between spouses. "If a husband buys his wife a dishwasher for their anniversary, that's not romantic. It is saying 'I love you but do the dishes.'"

Flowers, on the other hand, are romantic, because you can't do anything with them. "They are only a gesture to say 'you are the centre of my universe.'"

The rabbi quoted Rabbi Akiva as saying that some jealousy is good, because once you see your spouse through someone else's eyes, you are more conscious of the need to please them.

Rabbi Boteach said that we must keep our spouses as the centre of our universe, even if we have to deal with the distractions of work, children, and constant bustle. "Judaism says that greatness lies in the private sphere," not in the outside world, he said.

Iranian terrorism

Two weeks ago in this space, we urged the governments of the west "to bring their full political and economic weight to bear" against Iran to try to secure the freedom of the 13 Jews from Shiraz and Isfahan who have been arrested on phony charges of spying for Israel.

The government of Canada, we are pleased to note, has responded with earnest effort. It has, thus far, at least twice communicated its concern over the imprisonment of the Jews to Iranian officials. Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy has personally conveyed his alarm at the situation to the Iranian ambassador. He has also given his personal assurance to the World Jewish Congress that he would continue to explore all avenues available to him. In particular, he promised that he would seek to intervene directly with the Iranian foreign minister so that Canada's concerns for the welfare of the imprisoned Iranian Jews might be registered at the highest level. For all of us who are anxious about the fate of the "thirteen" and especially for the imprisoned Jews themselves, the Canadian response may sound quite modest. But if all countries of the west were to take the same steps, their cumulative impact could not be ignored by the rulers in Iran.

At one of the many community rallies in cities across Canada earlier in the week, Jim Peterson, secretary of state for international financial institutions, in Toronto forcefully reminded the Iranians that the arrest and imprisonment of the Jews cannot be regarded as merely an internal matter. There is a new world order in which respect for human rights occupies a very high place, Peterson proclaimed. "And Canada is part of it."

If the Iranians want also to be part of that new world order, they had better prove to the rest of the world their readiness to abide by the norms of humane, civil behavior. What they pass off as domestic law enforcement is nothing more than state terrorism.

Meanwhile, as western governments plead with Iran, Jews around the world must be vocal and visible in their efforts on behalf of the "thirteen." Innocent lives hang in the balance.

We may not know them by their faces. But we do, indeed, know these 13 men by their kindred connection to their fellow Jews, and by their names.

Iranian terrorists

It is uncertain whether the deadly barrage of Katyusha rockets that slammed into Kiryat Shmonah last week, killing two civilians, was related to the growing outcry from the west against Tehran's brutal imprisonment of the 13 Jews. What is certain however, is that Tehran – and Damascus – have the power over Hezbollah, their designated terrorists, to rein them in or indeed, to stop them altogether, from their murderous attacks against Israelis.

Iranian policy towards Israel and Jews seems governed by nothing higher or more enlightened than abject hatred. This hatred has so grotesquely infected the Iranian body politic, its leaders no longer recognize the pathology. Left untreated however, like all pathologies, it will one day be the country's ruination.

Wants open trial for accused 13 Iranian Jews

Upon learning of the arrest of 13 Iranian Jews and the fact that they were charged by the Iranian government as being spies for Israel and the United States, I immediately faxed a letter to Seyed Mohammad Adeli asking that I be permitted to be present at the trial as an observer. I also asked for the names and addresses of the accused, and the identity of their lawyers.

Additionally, I have written to the minister of foreign affairs and the minister of justice asking for their assistance in arranging for my attendance as an observer.

It is imperative that all your readers write to the ministers urging their complete co-operation in ensuring that the 13 accused are dealt with in accordance with international legal standards including an open trial and competent defence counsel.

Concordia did not fund Palestinian student group

Re, "Concordia students fight 'anti-Semitic' campaign," (CJN, April 9 (March 31, Montreal)).

The Concordia Collective for Palestinian Human Rights (CCPHR) is a student association which is attached to the Concordia Student Union. As such, it receives no funding from Concordia University whatsoever. The Student Union and all of its member associations are entirely independent of Concordia's administration both in terms of their funding and their activities, so long as those activities adhere to university policy and our Code of Rights and Responsibilities.

The article's assertion that the CCPHR is funded by Concordia's administration is absolutely false. Subsequent comments about the university funding "anti-Semitic" groups or activities are inaccurate and potentially damaging to the reputation of our institution.

As for the general tenor of the article, which suggests that Concordia is allowing or endorsing anti-Semitic activities on campus, nothing could be further from the truth. This situation, as are all situations involving disputes between groups holding different opinions, has been closely monitored by the university. The materials displayed and distributed by the CCPHR on campus have been checked and re-checked by both the Dean of Students' Office and by the Office of Rights and Responsibilities. While the material could be construed as presenting an extreme position and being of a somewhat polemical nature, it is by no means anti-Semitic.

The intention of some Jewish students at Concordia, to found their own association and to present information which challenges the position of the CCPHR, is one we applaud.

Objects to book review of Orthodox lifestyle

The book reviewed in Rabbi Bernard Baskin's column (CJN, June 3), depicts Orthodox Jews in a most demeaning and crude fashion. The book's author, a self proclaimed "cultural Jew," engages in mocking authentic Jewish culture – namely an Orthodox lifestyle.

The article's title ("Exploring Pious Jews") as well, enhances that mockery. The book does not explore pious Jews, but rather fictitiously demeans them in a fashion not unlike the Shylock character of previous generations.

As we stand at the threshold of Y2K, a sincere exploration of pious Jews would be of far more value to all, to help foster mutual respect within all segments of our community.

Transnistria added to death camp list in U.S. museum

On April 18, 1999, the name Transnistria was finally engraved and added to the names of all other death camps in the Remembrance Hall of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

The ceremony took place in the presence of more than 300 Transnistria survivors who had arrived from all corners of the United States and Canada. One Transnistria survivor came from as far as Hawaii. Among the 300 people present were survivors and members of the second and third generations.

The name Transnistria has been added due to the determination and incredible effort of a single person: Ruth Glasberg Gold, a native of Cernovitz (Romania), a Transnistria survivor and the author of Ruth's Journey: A Survivor's Memoir.

Along with other presentations at the Washington, D.C. ceremony, congratulatory letters from the Montreal Transnistria Survivors Association and the Association of Former Transnistria Camps-Kishinev (Moldova) were read. Until this date, the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre had been the only North American Museum that had inscribed Transnistria, in the memorial room. The Montreal site had commemorated Transnistria, along with all other death camps, in 1995.

Journalist faces catch-22 in reporting about Yugoslavia

By MICHAEL J. JORDAN
Special to The CJN

I'm a journalist and a Jew, but it was only recently that I became a Jewish journalist.

Curiously enough, it all began with the Kosovo conflict.

Far from the front pages of the world's newspapers is a story that is perhaps only of interest to Jewish audiences – the possible demise of two more Jewish communities in the Balkans.

As bombs rained down on Yugoslavia, Serb forces continued to kill, loot and expel ethnic Albanians from their homes. The refugees poured over the border into Macedonia (among other places) and threatened to tip that country's own delicate ethnic balance.

The instability had Jews in both states considering flight to safer havens.

Despite traditionally friendly relations with their countrymen, these Jews feared their exodus might be denounced by their neighbors as a "betrayal" of the nation. That would unleash anti-Semitism, which would further discourage these Jews from ever returning home.

In reporting on the fate of these Jews for the New York-based Jewish Telegraphic Agency (JTA), I have been torn by the following issue: present "the facts" and "the truth" of their plight, or assume a partisan role that feels, to me, like something bordering on complicity.

Is my first obligation to the reader, or to the safety of these small, nervous Jewish communities? The two objectives are incompatible, even diametrically opposed.

My father, of course, had some wisdom to share. Quoting my deceased grandmother, a Hungarian Holocaust survivor, he e-mailed me: "Do nothing that might harm a single hair on any Jew's head."

So, journalistic credos be damned! But as a committed career journalist, I found the choice was not so clear-cut. For five years, I have been a freelancer based in Budapest, writing mostly for, among others, JTA and the Christian Science Monitor. (Quite a tandem, religiously speaking.)

But the events of March 24 shattered my illusion of neutral observation. On that day, NATO launched air strikes against Yugoslavia. In turn, Serbs accelerated their ethnic cleansing of Albanians from the southern province of Kosovo. And within hours, busloads of Yugoslav Jews were on the road to Budapest, 250 miles north. They'd been invited by the Hungarian Jewish community, a plan that was kept hush-hush. I only learned of it days later, after the JTA, informed by other sources, ran a short bulletin on its newswire.

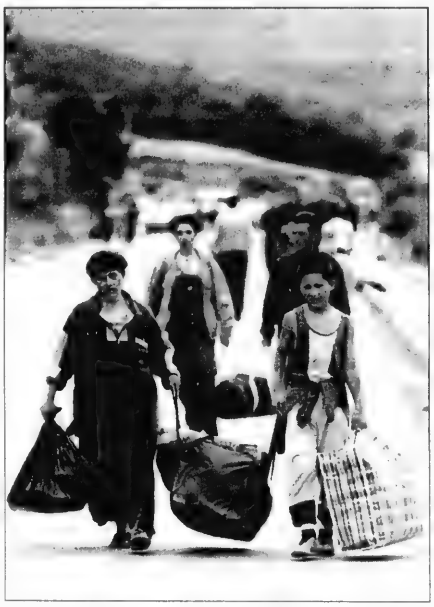
Now JTA wanted me to follow up with a feature story. On Monday morning, March 29, I walked to the local Jewish community centre, a couple blocks away from my apartment in downtown Budapest. Overnight, the airy, newly renovated centre had been transformed into a hostel. And instead of its normal morning quiet – until dozens of Holocaust survivors stroll in for their afternoon card games – the place was bustling with about 150 Jewish young people and older women, speaking Serbo-Croatian.

The din didn't last long.

When the crowd saw me approaching with pen and notepad, they became edgy and suspicious. I asked to speak to the local representative of the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), which was offering assistance to the newcomers, and to the Yugoslav group's appointed spokesperson.

The stonewalling soon began.

After giving me a few general details about the situation, the JDC representative, normally a media-friendly type, suggested we wait a few hours until they received clearance from headquarters in New York. Then I could go ahead with my story. I politely informed him that, regardless, I would be writing an article that day.



Albanian Kosovars return to their homes from refugee camps in Macedonia. [RNS/Reuters]

Next came the spokesperson, who is also head of the Jewish women's organization in Belgrade, the Yugoslav capital. From the outset, she insisted that her contingent not be referred to (and consequently stigmatized) as "refugees." They were, she said, officially "tourists," and wished to be described as such. (Later, a second JDC official suggested I refer to them with the awkward phrase "bombing escapees.")

I told the woman frankly that I would have trouble playing along with the "tourist" euphemism. But her reasoning was clear: Nationalists could easily twist and sensationalize the news of their departure, and portray them as "traitors."

And that would make life more miserable for the 3,000 Jews remaining in Yugoslavia. This, after all, is a totalitarian state where the media are very tightly controlled and libel and slander are alien concepts.

Once you have been branded a traitor, there is little hope of defending yourself. Still, I wondered if this woman wasn't being just a bit overly paranoid.

"They'll read what we're saying," she said, through the Yugoslav Embassy in DC. I scoffed: If it were in the New York Times or Washington Post, sure. But why would any Yugoslav read JTA?

The real reason for the spokesperson's anxiety, then, was that Jews – especially those in eastern Europe – know better than anyone that in a flash, anti-Semitism can rear its ugly head. Anytime, anywhere.

Yugoslav and Macedonian Jewry, like so many of their European counterparts, were decimated by the Holocaust. (It must be noted, however, the deed was not carried out by homegrown fascists.)

Then came four decades of repressive communism. The public was conditioned to never challenge authority, or else pay a price – like unemployment, prison or even death.

That's why the president of the Yugoslav Jewish community, himself a Holocaust survivor, instructed this woman not to utter a single politically oriented comment while abroad.

The more I probed, the more nervous she became. She didn't want her name used. Then she wanted to retract much of what she had already told me. Soon, a crowd formed around us; from all sides I was being pressured not to write anything at all.

I tried to explain my predicament. How could I act as if I had not seen these people? Their very reaction, their fear of exposure, convinced me this was even more of a "story." How could I conceal the fact there were Jews in the world who felt endangered?

Moreover – and from a practical, but purely competitive standpoint – I'd just discovered from someone in the crowd that the Israeli and Hungarian media had also learned of their exodus.

Their story would get out one way or another, I told them.

Understandably, the Jews surrounding me were unsympathetic to my cause.

After all, this was their life I was writing about. And here I was, upset about mere journalistic principles. "As a Jew," they pleaded, "you have certain responsibilities."

They were right, of course, but I didn't like it.

Deflated, I managed to do one or two more half-hearted interviews (names and identities withheld, of course) and headed home. I still had an article to write.

My thoughts raced as I outlined how I would word it. As soon as I got home, I fired off an elaborate e-mail to my editors, describing the pickle I was in. (They would later tell me to proceed, but cautiously.)

And then I wrote. Among other points, I danced around the "refugee" vs. "tourist" distinction, touched on their anxiety about the loyalty issue, and went to great lengths to illustrate the Jewish community's fondness for Yugoslavia and their desire to return home soon.

No lies, mind you. Just a case of emphasizing certain angles, downplaying others. It was an article I could live with.

The only slip-up – in the eyes of the Yugoslav Jews and JDC officials who read it later – was that I quoted an unnamed young woman as saying, "Milosevic is a jerk," as one of her comments. Too political, I was told later. Too dangerous.

Over the next couple of weeks, I wondered how the Jews in Macedonia were holding up. I'd visited them a year and a half earlier, and was impressed with how actively this small, tight-knit community, which officially had 190 members, was, in preserving its identity, history and traditions.

I'd been reading in the papers how the influx of Kosovo Albanians was exacerbating relations between the Macedonian majority and its own large, restive population of ethnic Albanians.

When I finally met Macedonia's Jews a few days later in mid-April, it was déjà vu. I'll spare you all the details, but it was more linguistic acrobatics. I was free to ask them anything, they said, but they wouldn't tell me everything. Again, the truth was too risky; it might rile the neighbors.

My meeting with community leaders was two hours of playing cat and mouse: I chiselled away for nuggets of information; they responded diplomatically, with grand but bland statements, such as: "Jews have always shared the fate of the Macedonians."

Later, someone finally stumbled and admitted that the Bulgarian Jews in Sofia, like the Hungarian Jews in Budapest, had offered some sort of escape route, just in case.

Today, it seems that offer may come in handy.

Most people I spoke with during my week in Macedonia – Macedonians, Albanians, Jews and others – predicted that their country, too, was ripe for civil war. Tomorrow, perhaps, or in 10 years.

So that's what I wrote for JTA.

What, then, are the lessons learned from these two experiences? I still wrestle with the moral dimensions of the question: Does publishing the truth serve the greater good? I think it does. Certainly, heeding grandma's words, I don't want to be the cause of harm to any hair on any head.

But in this case, writing that things are fine within Yugoslavia and Macedonia – for Jews or any other minority – only misleads the outside world. And sadly, it is the outside world that will be needed in the event of a conflict.

After living in central Europe for six years, I've learned close up about this Jewish tendency to avoid "making waves."

Yet it's a hopeless catch-22. A synagogue is vandalized, or a politician says something anti-Semitic. Rather than speak up, they suffer in silence, for fear of making it worse. Which means no one knows there's a problem, so it happens again.

Opinions

The 'Y' chromosome

They are called Lemba. They are a tribe of 50,000 in southern Africa. Up to now very little has been known about them, but lately they have had two distinctions: they made the front page of the Jerusalem Report, and a few days later of the Sunday New York Times. That is quite a journey for a small group of people whose existence was hardly known outside of their own immediate environment.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

It all started when a University of Toronto researcher, Dr. Karl Sorecki, entered his synagogue in 1995 and saw a young man, a kohen, receive the first aliyah at the Torah service, as is the custom in every traditional synagogue. Sorecki, a kohen himself, wondered whether he and the one that was called up had anything genetically in common. Could their descent from the priestly tribe be verified by genetic investigation?

Sorecki not only followed up his idea, but he did it with vim and vigor. He contacted scientists in various parts of the world and enrolled them in an investigatory program. On one occasion, kohanim, gathered at the Wall in Jerusalem, agreed to have themselves tested. They provided cell samples, taken by swabs from their mouths – a procedure that takes only seconds but seems to have implications that stretch over millennia.

Analyses of the samples were submitted to DNA researchers who found that the swabs have a remarkable feature in common: their Y chromosomes have identical sets of markers. This seems to indicate that those who exhibit this particular DNA identification have indeed a common ancestry.

This joint origin has of course been an oral tradition amongst those who considered themselves part of the kohanitic tribe. Sometimes it is their name – like Kahn, Kagan, or Katz (an acronym of the first letters of Kohen Tsedek), but more than the name, it is the tradition handed from father to son across the generations that has given today's kohanim their identity. The genetic marker verifies their oral tradition with reasonable accuracy.

This research would in itself have been newsworthy, but it has been enhanced by the fact that a South African tribe that traces its origin to Yemen in southern Arabia and further back to Israel, lays claims to the same ancestry.

Members of the tribe have long been Christians, but at the same time have maintained their claim to Jewish descent. For hundreds of years they have practised certain Jewish rites, but it is only now that this has become public knowledge. Lemba people do not contemplate migrating to Israel, but they are glad that their origins have finally been given credence.

To be sure, there are other people that carry the same marker on their Y chromosomes, but nowhere is the percentage of such incidents as high as amongst those who identify themselves as kohanim.

No wonder all of this has made the news. Meanwhile, Sorecki is teaching at the Technion in Haifa and is affiliated with the Rambam Hospital. To him and to all others who have busied themselves with this project, one feature remains central: A powerful Jewish oral tradition has suddenly been given scientific support.

Barak's daunting agenda

In Ehud Barak's few public pronouncements since his election as prime minister, he has spoken of three key challenges: the peace process with the Palestinians and Syria, a social challenge, and constitutional reform.

While a great deal of attention is given to Barak's plans for moving the peace process forward, his domestic agenda is no less ambitious.

In his campaign, Barak emphasized a more equitable allocation of resources in education and social policy. He challenged the preferential treatment given to West Bank settlements and educational institutions run by Shas, and funding for yeshivot run by Shas and the haredi Yahadut Hatorah. This funding pattern had reflected Likud's own policy on the settlements, as well as coalition agreements with other parties.

Barak wants to do things a different way. He speaks of an equitable allocation of resources that is based on transparency and accountability, rather than on back-room deals. But aside from the attractive rhetoric, Barak knows there is a serious political imperative involved.

This time around, he succeeded in cracking the wall of support for Benjamin Netanyahu in development towns and poorer socio-economic areas, but it was just a crack. He is already looking ahead to the election of 2003. In order to penetrate those communities, Barak must deliver on a strong social platform that will reconnect them to the Labor party (now called One Israel), from which they have been alienated for decades.

Barak acknowledges the role played by Shas in meeting social needs, but he wants to make Shas services a choice rather than the only game in town. He speaks of introducing a longer school day in the public school system, universal early childhood programs, and better student loan programs for higher education. At the same time, he speaks of including core subjects like science, math and citizenship in the Shas schools as a condition of public funding.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

To many observers, this sounds like a revival of the Israeli welfare state of old. But Barak sees himself operating in the mould of Tony Blair's Third Way. He wants to reincarnate the Labor party as Israel's "new" Labor, incorporating elements of a strong market orientation along with a new social program that can meet the challenge of the weaker elements in Israeli society.

To do so effectively will likely require far-reaching tax reform that will reconstruct some of the basic building blocks of government intervention in the marketplace and society. Several such proposals have been put before Barak, including a comprehensive plan drafted by a prominent task force at the independent Institute for Social Policy Research in Jerusalem.

The constitutional challenge is no less daunting. Barak has firmly stated that the rule of law and democratic norms come first and foremost on his agenda. In the absence of a constitution, Israel has passed a series of Basic Laws guaranteeing a series of human and civil rights.

The passage of several of these laws has been delayed due to the fundamental conflict between the religious and secular visions of the state and its relation to its citizens. Barak is sensitive to the fact that while many Israelis resent the mix of religion and politics, they also do not want a complete separation of religion from the state. In other words, they want some definition of a Jewish state to be a fundamental plank of their sovereign existence.

The tough question is how to incorporate this into a constitutional framework that has to pass the test of a secular democratic framework, and how to do so without increasing the divisiveness that already exists around these issues.

Barak faces two immediate political challenges that are related to this agenda. In the last year, the Supreme Court has thrown two hot issues back into the legislative arena.

The first is the exemption from military service for yeshiva students. Barak has six months in which to draft a new compromise that will be acceptable to his religious coalition partners, but will also deal with the widespread public resentment and his own election promise to revise the current situation.

The second is the issue of conversions to Judaism in the state of Israel. Barak has to introduce legislation reflecting the Ne'eman committee compromise or the issue will go back to the high court.

As in similar Canadian cases, the court has rejected the status quo as being incompatible with the newer Basic Laws that have been passed. This position, and the inherent activism of the current chief justice, Aharon Barak, have led to vitriolic criticism of the courts by haredi leaders. For Prime Minister Barak, these will be early test cases of the new spirit he wishes to bring to these profound debates.

Existential challenge of the panhandler

In mid-June the Globe and Mail ran two consecutive opinion pieces on attitudes to panhandlers. The first article expressed a very clear position against giving any handouts. The arguments are well known: The money will not solve their problem but rather increase their dependency. They will probably use the money for booze or drugs. We pay enough taxes as it is; the state should be addressing the problems of the poor. Socialists would tell me regularly that they did not believe in giving charity because it just propped up the capitalist system, which is probably true … And so on. There are plenty of reasons not to give.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

The second article was designed to counterbalance the first. It was the story of a middle class Canadian university student in Europe, trying to get to an airport to catch a plane home. She ran short of cash, and suddenly her bank card did not work either. So she was forced to solicit money from strangers to get the cab fare to make it to the airport. That harrowing experience sensitized her from then on to the plight of the homeless and needy, and so today she gives.

Neither article was satisfying from a Judaic perspective, though the second resonated far more than the first. The first was too mean-spirited, plain and simple. Policy wonks can debate how to reduce poverty rates and the link between dependency and other social factors. But seeing an outstretched palm asking for spare change is an existential, moral dilemma. We choose to give, or not to give.

But the second article also posed problems for me. The unintended implication was somehow that if the student's bank card had worked that fateful day, she would not have become sensitized to the poor. Her story actually reminded me of the biblical injunction that Jews care for the less fortunate because we Jews had the previous experience of being slaves in Egypt and strangers in a foreign land.

But think of the implications of this kind of reciprocal morality. Suppose we Jews had not been slaves in Egypt, nor strangers in a foreign land. Would we Jews, like the student and most Canadians, then have to respond to existential challenges of the outstretched palm in a moral vacuum? To give or not to give?

Actually, Judaism offers us a moral safety net. We do not have to concern ourselves with the motivations or excessive cost-benefit analysis of giving to the poor, or of doing a good deed. The perspective of the Jewish religious tradition is clear, even had we never been slaves or known misery. For these are mitzvot, or commandments. We have no choice. Assuming we can afford it, we must give to the panhandler in the street. (We can do other things as well to solve social problems, but political work does not absolve us of the imperative to help at that moment…)

So for some people, the fact that we Jews have known suffering and poverty makes the injunction to help the less fortunate more understandable. But the bottom line is that Jews are commanded to do these good deeds, and the more of them we do, the better. In fact, the poor person asking us for a hand-out is doing us a favor, by enabling us to fulfil one more commandment. So when we give, we are seizing an opportunity for ourselves as much as we are helping someone out.

I learned all this from my late father. He had the habit of trying to have spare change in his pocket when he went out, lest he come across a needy person. He also taught me the lovely custom of giving a traveller a dollar to give to the first beggar she might see at her destination. This transforms the traveller into a shaliach mitzvah, or messenger of mercy, and would grant her a safe journey in order to carry out your good deed.

So do I always give? Of course not. I will admit I have particular problems giving to young able bodied well-behaved men, though I sometimes do. And I know that on occasion I have been hustled by semi-professional old women and young children, for whom panhandling is a chosen way of life. Like everyone else I am too rushed to stop. Or if I have already given once, I feel that is my quota for the day. And so on.

Yet every time I do not give, I feel a pang of guilt. Which, I suppose, is also a Jewish response of sorts.

The Kirshner File

Settlements generate fierce controversy

Jewish settlements in the disputed territories will probably top the agenda when Israel and the Palestinian Authority finally and belatedly launch permanent status negotiations on a wide range of crucial issues.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Israel's prime minister-elect, the Labor party's Ehud Barak, is acutely aware that settlements generate controversy. Even as he struggled to cobble together a government, the issue surfaced repeatedly.

A day after the May 17 election, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's lame-duck government approved a plan to extend the boundaries of Ma'ale Adumim, the largest settlement in the West Bank. The announcement enraged the Palestinians. They warned Barak that peace talks could not be resumed without a halt to settlement activity.

Settlements also precipitated heated and protracted exchanges during Barak's coalition talks with potential coalition partners. Meretz, the left-wing party, insisted on a settlement freeze, while the right-wing National Religious Party was equally insistent on the need to preserve and maintain settlements.

As these disagreements flared, there was speculation that Barak would curtail settlement construction and suspend the preferential economic benefits currently enjoyed by settlers.

But in a counterpoint to these reports, Barak said that he had strong emotional ties to the West Bank, and that he fully intended to establish settlement blocs there.

However one reads the political tea leaves, settlements have been a source of bitter division in Israeli politics since the Six Day War.

Within months of Israel's victory, the Labor party government, headed by Prime Minister Levi Eshkol, authorized the building of settlements in the West Bank, with the proviso that they be located in sparsely populated Palestinian areas. His successors, Golda Meir and Yitzhak Rabin, shared this outlook for strategic and sentimental reasons.

Shortly after the 1967 war, Israel offered to relinquish the bulk of the territories in return for peace. But with the Khartoum Declaration, the Arab states made it abundantly clear that they were neither prepared to recognize Israel's existence nor to enter into peace talks with Israel. As a result, the Israeli government continued to create "facts on the ground."

At the United Nations, Israel was accused of contravening the 1949 Fourth Geneva Convention, which forbids the transfer of an occupying power's civilian population to the area under its control.

Menachem Begin, the first Likud prime minister, was not concerned with such niceties. He built many new settlements, not only in the West Bank but also in the Gaza Strip, the Sinai Peninsula and the Golan Heights.

At the Labor party's insistence, the building boom in the territories slowed during the era of national unity governments from 1984 to 1990. But when the Labor party pulled out of the coalition, Likud accelerated the pace of construction.

Rabin, the prime minister from 1992 to 1995, and his successor, Shimon Peres, who lost the 1996 election, imposed a partial building freeze and withdrew the settlers' privileges – notably tax breaks and low-interest mortgages. But Rabin, distinguishing between dispensable "political" settlements and strategically vital "security" settlements, constructed new outposts around Jerusalem and along the Green Line, as well as bypass roads to skirt Palestinian towns.

By Netanyahu's estimation, the settlements expanded by 50 percent during this period, when Israel reportedly sank nearly $500 million into the territories and the Jewish population of the West Bank (and the Gaza Strip) grew from roughly 100,000 to 140,000.

Far more ideologically committed to the settlers than either of his two predecessors, Netanyahu reinstated the benefits they had cancelled, but resisted entreaties to erect new settlements. Instead, he decided to enlarge existing ones.

The Oslo agreements theoretically place no restrictions on settlements, but Netanyahu realized that an official, full-blown settlement drive might well touch off another Palestinian rebellion, destroy the peace process – which he had grudgingly accepted – and alienate the United States, Israel's major ally.

Be that as it may, the Jewish population in the West Bank rose, reaching 172,000 by the end of 1998, and housing starts doubled. Netanyahu pushed the limits of settlement expansion, although his communications director, David Bar-Ilan, claimed that "not one square inch is being added to any settlements."

In an effort to appease constituents on the far right, Netanyahu promised them that all Jewish settlements would remain under Israel's administration, even after a final agreement with the Palestinians was signed.

Throughout his term of office, Netanyahu continually rejected American demands for a freeze, or "time-out," as U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright described it. He based his rejection on the grounds that Israel was merely accommodating "natural growth."

Yet U.S. intelligence data leaked to Israeli newspapers painted a completely different picture. By Washington's reckoning, 25 percent of homes in West Bank settlements were empty. Comparable figures for Gaza and the Golan were 50 percent and 25 percent, respectively.

Ariel Sharon

As his shaky government floundered in the wake of the 1998 Wye memorandum, under which he had agreed to withdraw from a further 13 percent of the West Bank, Netanyahu turned a blind eye to land grabs carried out by radical fringes of the settler movement.

At least 19 new settlements, usually consisting of scattered caravans, sprang up in the months following Wye.

The settlers were encouraged and egged on by Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon. Urging them to seize hilltops, he had grandly predicted that 20,000 more Jews would live in the West Bank by the end of 1999.

Sharon's motives were crystal clear: to break up the geographic continuity of the West Bank and thus make it impossible for the Palestinians to establish a viable and contiguous state.

"It is a systematic, stepped-up campaign to confiscate more land," charged Palestinian spokesperson Hanan Ashrawi. "They will build enough settlements to fill the West Bank with Israelis, then there won't be a need for final status negotiations."

Indifferent to Palestinian concerns, Netanyahu made a point of expressing unequivocal support for the settlers. "We have done a lot, and we will do a lot more," he said on the eve of the election, in a transparent bid to curry favor with them and their allies.

Not surprisingly, Netanyahu's settlement policy strained Israel's pivotal relationship with the United States.

Washington has consistently hewed to the view that unilateral actions are imprudent, because they sour the atmosphere and prejudge and predetermine the outcome of negotiations.

Several months ago, in a harsh rejoinder to Israel, Dennis Ross, Washington's special envoy to the Mideast, called settlement activity "destructive" to the peace process.

Israel's settlement policy will face still further scrutiny later this month when a United Nations conference in Geneva is scheduled to tackle this contentious question.

Once again, Israel will come under fierce pressure to put an end to a policy which has antagonized friends and foes alike since the Six Day War.

Days of mourning

By RABBI AARON FLANZRAICH

This week, as we commence the observance of the three weeks that commemorates the beginning of the destruction of the first and second Temples, we begin one of the most tragic periods of Jewish life.

Starting with the 17th of Tammuz, there are a number of powerful customs that have been adopted as law, to enforce a national observance of loss and mourning. For this reason, you will be hard pressed to find Jewish couples that celebrate a wedding anniversary at this time of year, because weddings are prohibited.

Yet, the Talmud offers a puzzling question about one of these observances. It has been a nearly 2,000-year custom not to launder clothing during the final nine days leading to Tisha b'Av – the actual day of the Temples' destruction.

In this day and age, this is not as severe a decree as it was in the time it developed into a practice. Clothing was a precious commodity, and people didn't have closets filled with shirts, pants and suits waiting to be worn. However, since the beginning of time, there have always been the "haves" and the "have nots," those who have been blessed with material abundance and those who struggle to make ends meet.

A classic confrontation

So the Talmud asks this question: "What if during this time of mourning, all a person had was one shirt? Could he then wash it?" The debate takes many twists and turns, and it is complicated by the original idea that a person – every person – should have clean clothes for Shabbat.

Yet, in spite of all the lines drawn to keep and enforce this important time of mourning, one problem does not go away – the question of "What if all a person had was one shirt?" So imagine this: Imagine, that in the hot and steamy time of August in the Middle East when the sweat rolls off you, not in the middle of the afternoon but in the morning, your shirt becomes soiled and wet. After a day or two, you become embarrassed to walk the street because of the smell and appearance.

Herein lies the classic confrontation: What do we do when the demands of humanity confront the demands of the law? In the end, through a legal loophole of sorts, the sages permitted the one-shirt person to wash his clothing.

In our own time also, we cannot only be concerned with the narrow observance of our laws as if they fulfil the totality of Judaism's spirit. Because they don't. In a world filled with inhumanity, to both Jews and non-Jews alike, we need to remember the powerful lesson of what these days of mourning teach us, and what humanity demands from us.

Lists, lists and more lists

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Do you want to give your kids a quality Jewish education at home but don't know anybody else who's trying to do the same thing? [http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Agora/7633/JewishHomeSchoolers.html].

Are you a descendant of Spanish and Portuguese Jews who were forced to convert under duress? [http://members.tripod.com/~anak/anusim.htm]. Or would you like a synopsis of the Torah reading mailed to you weekly? [http://www.ohr.org.il/web/sub.htm] No problem. There's an e-mail list for you.

Last week, we looked at one of the most powerful and interesting areas of the Jewish Highway, e-mail lists. Today, where to find lists on practically any topics, how to create one of your own, and how you can join in, even if you don't have your own Internet account.

Most of the major Jewish sites host dozens or hundreds of lists.

Virtual Jerusalem [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/lists/] has over 100 lists. For example, "Passing Phrase" will appeal to people interested in idiomatic Hebrew as spoken by Israelis. There's a Shiduch list and there's Mishkan Ohelim, a list for people interested in what happened to "the over 20,000 children of Yemenite, Eastern, and Balkan backgrounds during the founding years of the State of Israel."

Shamash hosts over 300 lists [http://shamash.org/help/listoflists.html] including Rikud for fans of Israeli folkdancing, Kol-Isha for halachic questions concerning women's roles in Judaism, and Habonet, a place where Habonim alumni can swap notes and memories. I particularly like Shamash because they archive most past correspondence so you can catch up the discussion so far.

"Jewishnet" [http://www.jewishnet.net/services/lis.htm] does not operate its own lists. Rather, it has assembled a convenient listing of hundreds of Jewish lists from all over the Internet. You will find some duplication between its contents and the other Jewish lists.

What do you do if you want to join an online community, have access to the Internet but cannot get your own e-mail account? That's no problem because of the numerous Internet sites that will provide you with a free e-mail address. The most famous provider of free accounts is Hotmail [http://hotmail.com] but for more free e-mail providers, see the long list at Free Stuff [http://www.1freestuff.com/e-mail/accounts.shtml].

Recently, some Jewish and Israeli-based companies also got into the act with their own brands of free e-mail with names like JewishMail [http://www.jewishmail.com] or Virtual Jerusalem [http://login.virtualjerusalem.com/].

These free e-mail accounts differ from standard ones because your (secure) mail is stored on a computer somewhere else in the world. With your password, you are able to check your mail and compose correspondence from anywhere. These accounts really are free but you'll usually have to wade through some advertising before you can read your mail.

Still hunting for that perfect e-mail list? Try searching the List of Lists [http://catalog.com/vivian/interest-group-search.html], CataList [http://www.lsoft.com/lists/listref.html], and Liszt [http://www.liszt.com/]. (Get it, "Liszt"?) OneList is an excellent site that makes it very easy to search for, and subscribe to lists [http://www.onelist.com/]. I came up with over 100 lists when I searched for the word "Israel" and more than 200 for "Jewish."

There's a list for the discussion of business ethics from a Jewish perspective, a list for fans of the singer Debbie Friedman, and another to explore the genealogy of the name Gottesman. If your name isn't Gottesman, or you want to create a list on just about any other topic, you can do it for free through OneList. You're bound to strike a conversation with somebody, somewhere.

Peace now has a chance

By SIMON ROSENBLUM

Guest Voices

Ehud Barak, Israel's next prime minister, not only received a strong mandate to vigorously pursue the peace process, but also has the opportunity of putting together a broad based government without being held to ransom by any of the parties that might be part of a new governing coalition. With such an opportunity of course, comes a great responsibility.

The peace process is, without doubt, the major beneficiary of the May election. Benjamin Netanyahu's commitment to Oslo was thin at best, and — aided at times by Yasser Arafat's less than fulsome implementation of Palestinian security obligations — he successfully wrestled the peace process into the ground. The implications of his election were clear. When the election campaign began last year, the centrist Israeli newspaper Ma'ariv editorialized: "If the right wins, the peace process will sink into the deep mud."

But how much different are the peace and security policies of Ehud Barak and his newly elected One Israel government? Casual observations of the six-month-long election campaign would have led one to conclude that the differences between Barak and Netanyahu were more of style than substance. Clearly, they both waged American-style campaigns whose primary emphasis was chasing down the undecided voter. Consequently, politics was drawn to the centre from almost all quarters.

Yet, it would be a big error to mistake this for policy congruence. The differences between Netanyahu and Barak with regards to the peace process are significant both in attitude and in substance. Attitude is crucial. Barak is clearly pro-Oslo, and is determined to conclude both a final status agreement with the Palestinians, and hopefully, also a deal with Syria. Pro-Oslo forces will clearly bring new life and momentum to the peace process, and will negotiate positively, not negatively, since they do not see negotiations as a zero sum game.

As for policy specifics, Barak, speaking on Israel's television Channel 2 on April 11, outlined the four "red lines" of his party's approach toward a final agreement with the Palestinians: Jerusalem will remain united as Israel's eternal capital; there will be no return to the pre-1967 borders; there will be no foreign or Palestinian army west of the Jordan river; and most Jewish residents of the West Bank will live in large settlement blocks under Israeli sovereignty.

Without being overly sanguine, one can note that nothing in the above need necessarily block the conclusion of a just and lasting peace. Back in 1995, senior Israeli and Palestinian officials, Yossi Beilin and Abu Mazen, worked out a framework for reaching a final status agreement, which would have had Israel turn over 90 percent of the West Bank to a largely demilitarized Palestinian state, and would have a small Palestinian village, Abu Dis on the outskirts of Jerusalem, serve as the capital of this new Palestinian state.

Under this arrangement, 70 percent of the Israeli settlers would then be within Israel's new borders, and Palestinians living within a politically and geographically undivided Jerusalem would be able to be citizens of the newly created Palestinian state.

Suffice to say, none of Barak's four red lines are in direct conflict with the Beilin/Mazen plan. Negotiations will indeed be tough and undoubtedly there will be the occasional breakdown. Barak – as would any Israeli prime minister – will properly insist that the Palestinian Authority fulfil all of their obligations. The difference now will be that the Israeli demand for reciprocity will not be an excuse for sabotaging the peace process.

Barak will be welcomed into a permissive atmosphere for peace. Arafat and the Palestinian Authority will surely not want to jeopardize what may be Oslo's last chance. They will likely have their hands full as Hamas and other Islamic fundamentalist groups will, no doubt, do their best to sabotage the conclusion of a peace agreement. On the Israeli side, Barak will be given considerable room to negotiate since – according to the recent Peace Index of the Tami Steinmetz Centre for Peace Research at Tel Aviv University – 55 percent of Israelis now believe that the Palestinians deserve their own independent state, and 69 percent believe that such an outcome is a natural conclusion to the peace process.

When Barak goes to the Israeli public with a referendum on a final status deal, as he has committed to do, he will likely find that Israelis are willing to be generous with territorial concessions as long as they perceive the Palestinians as being generous in the fulfilment of their security obligations. Peace cannot be made on the cheap by either side. What has now changed, is that both sides will be bargaining in good faith. Peace now has a chance.

Photos honor Swiss war hero

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The largely unsung heroism of a man described as an angel of mercy is the subject of a remarkable photo exhibit at the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

Visas for Life, a collection of about two dozen black and white photos, documents the efforts of Carl Lutz, who saved 62,000 Hungarian Jews from Hitler's clutches in wartime Budapest – a fact often eclipsed by the more famous actions of Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg, who is credited with rescuing 100,000 Hungarian Jews from certain death.

From 1942 to 1945, Lutz was in charge of the foreign interests section of the Swiss diplomatic mission in Budapest, representing not only Switzerland but some Allied countries at war with the Nazis.

As deputy consul of the Swiss legation, he negotiated with the Nazis to permit the emigration of anyone holding immigration papers to Palestine.

Later, he issued Jews thousands of so-called safe conduct documents, and placed their holders in safe houses protected by Swiss neutrality.

He later worked with Wallenberg, who also issued false documents. But unlike Wallenberg, who was dispatched to Budapest by his government, Lutz worked without his superiors' knowledge.

Carl Lutz's daughter, Agnes Hirschi, before a photo of her father. [Ron Csillag photo]

On hand at the exhibit's opening last week were Switzerland's ambassador to Canada, Urs Ziswiler, and Agnes Hirschi, Lutz' adopted daughter, who came from Switzerland.

Hirschi recounted that as a child of six in 1944, she, her brother and mother were hidden by Lutz in the cellar of the British legation in Budapest for three months.

After the war, Lutz divorced his wife and married Hirschi's mother, Magda.

Lutz, who died in 1975 at the age of 80, was designated by Yad Vashem as Righteous Among the Nations. In 1963, the city of Haifa named a street for him.

The exhibit showcases the devastation visited on Budapest in the war's later stages. Many of the family-owned pictures show a dapper Lutz with his stunned-looking charges.

The exhibit, sponsored by the Bathurst Jewish Centre and the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, in co-operation with the Swiss consulate in Toronto and Pro Helvetica, the Cultural Council of Switzerland, runs through July 15 in the BJC's lobby atrium.

On the road to Israel's future

The Trans-National Highway

Israel Bonds will help finance Israel's first Trans-National highway.

Contracted in part, by Canada's own Canadian Highways International Corporation, this project will extend 86 kilometres from just west of Jerusalem north to halfway between Tel Aviv and Haifa. The 4-lane highway will include 88 bridges and 13 interchanges and upon completion in December 2002, it will handle as many as 35,000 vehicles per day.

The impact on Israel's economy will be significant, generating 4900 direct jobs during construction and as many as 10,500 jobs in support industries.

Israel Bonds and the Trans-Israel Highway.... literally driving the Nation to the 21st century and beyond!

University presidents join study visit to Israel

OTTAWA — Eighteen Canadian university presidents and the president of the Council of Ontario Universities left June 27 for a 10-day study visit to Israel.

The trip is organized by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and is being led by CJC past president Prof. Irving Abella. This is the second time that CJC has sponsored a visit to Israel by university presidents.

The heads of the following universities are participating: Brock, Concordia, Dalhousie, McMaster, Mount Saint Vincent, Nipissing, Queen's, Ryerson Polytechnic, St. Francis Xavier, University of Alberta, University of Calgary, University of Guelph, University of King's College, University of Manitoba, University of Regina, University of Windsor, University of Winnipeg and Wilfred Laurier University.

Abella, who headed up CJC's first trip in 1994, was pleased at the response to CJC's invitation.

"Ever since the highly successful 1994 visit, we have made it a priority to take another group. We believed that a new group of participants would find the experience equally as important and we are thrilled that so many have accepted our invitation."

Said CJC president Moshe Ronen: "Study visits like these present an invaluable opportunity for discourse, exchange and learning that could set the stage for future joint activity between Canadian and Israeli universities.

"Israel is home to some of the finest academic institutions in the world and Canadian Jewish Congress is delighted to be able to facilitate contacts between them and Canadian universities."

The tour is slated to visit all seven Israeli universities and one academic college. Participants are also scheduled to visit Bethlehem University in the Palestinian territory.

Other highlights include a tour of Jerusalem, a meeting with the Chief Justice of Israel and with Israeli president Ezer Weizman, a visit to the Golan Heights and the upper Galilee, and a Canada Day reception at the residence of the Canadian ambassador.

מילעניום, שמילעניום - די וועלט ניט נישט אונטער!

Most political pundits expected a dramatic cabinet shuffle immediately upon the prime minister's return from Europe. Speculation was rampant about who was in, who was out, and who was way out.

Sergio Marchi, for instance, was expected to leave politics altogether, and accept a diplomatic posting to Rome. Similarly, Marcel Massé was touted for an ambassadorial appointment to Paris.

Lloyd Axworthy, John Manley and Paul Martin were rumored to be involved in a round of musical cabinet chairs and Diane Marleau was headed for the Senate. The list goes on, but that is beside the point.

The issue of a cabinet shuffle is not nearly as much about the fortunes of a group of aspirants as it is about what Jean Chrétien's personal plans are for the immediate future.

If he plans on retiring, then it is reasonable to expect that some of his closest allies, like Marchi, would also move on to greener pastures.

If, on the other hand the prime minister is inclined to stay and engage the separatists in Quebec one last time, then he may be in the process of organizing the strategic plan for the federalists' forces. In this case, a shuffle would only be a distraction and blurr the focus on the battle plan.

A third possibility is that the prime minister is very worried about the growing trend within the Liberal caucus to chart a more independent and antagonistic course. Some have suggested that the shuffle has been postponed until after the national caucus meeting in August simply to keep the cabinet wannabees docile.

While only Chrétien and perhaps Jean Pelletier know his plans for sure, these musings are not simply idle speculation.

The Jewish community has invested a considerable amount of energy in developing relationships with various cabinet members. Their political fortunes will have a direct impact on the community's ability to pursue its agenda.

Whether on the issues pertaining to Israel, Jewish hostages in Iran, Holocaust museums, anti-Semitism or charitable donations to religious institutions, those contacts and points of access do matter.

It therefore behooves the community to pay closer attention to these developments and, to the extent possible, anticipate who's in and who's out.

Noa makes her Winnipeg debut at Negev gala concert

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Achinoam Nini, or Noa as she is better known to her fans around the world, made her Winnipeg debut on June 15 as the star of the second annual Jewish National Fund of Canada, Manitoba and Saskatchewan region, Negev Gala Concert.

In front of an audience of about 1,300 at Centennial Concert Hall, Noa sang in English and Hebrew, and played drums and other smaller instruments accompanied by back-up musicians, Yaaki Levy (drums), Yorai Oron (bass), Gil Zohar (keyboard) and her longtime musical partner Gil Dor (guitars).

Noa

Noa, born in Israel into a Yemenite family, grew up in the Bronx. She returned to Israel at 17 to join the army. She met Dor at university, where he was one of her teachers.

"My life has been filled with rays of light since I have known Gil," she said.

Their collaboration over the past 10 years has resulted in international stardom for her. She has toured Europe with Sting, appeared on television with Stevie Wonder, and played to sold-out audiences at Carnegie Hall and other concert halls throughout the United States.

Noa sang a new song for her audience in celebration of Ehud Barak's victory in the recent Israeli election. "For the last three years, we Israelis have been intensely miserable," she said in introducing the new song. "Now there is a positive attitude in the air. We don't expect perfection, but things will be better."

Other highlights of the evening included the introduction of Avner Regev, new executive vice-president of the Jewish National Fund of Canada, and Mickey Haclay, JNF's new shaliach in Winnipeg. Screened for the first time was From Winnipeg to Israel With Love: The Work of JNF Canada, produced with the assistance of former JNF Winnipeg shaliach Ze'ev Kedem. It is the first JNF video to highlight the projects of a specific Jewish community.

Winnipeg teenager a debating champ

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — International teen debating sensation Michael Kives is about to conquer new worlds.

Fresh from becoming the first person ever to win the World Public Speaking and Debating Championship two years in a row, the Winnipeg teen is slated for his first appearance jousting with words on ABC Television's Politically Incorrect, a show hosted by Bill Maher, where participants debate current events and world issues.

The 18-year-old, who is graduating from high school this year, took the initiative in approaching the American TV show. "I can debate any side of an issue," he says.

He is scheduled to appear on the show for the first time on June 24.

"The producers have told me that they want me on the show as a repeat guest from time to time," he says. "Since I will be going to Stanford University in California in the fall [in a liberal Arts program], that will work out well."

Kives is a graduate of St. John's Ravenscourt, a school noted internationally for its debating program. Kives began his debating activities in Grade 8, the first year students are eligible.

By the end of that year, he qualified for the national competition in Halifax. He was the youngest competitor, and he finished first in his category.

In Grade 9, he won the National Championship again, making him the first person to win championships two years in a row.

In Grade 10, he placed first in the Western Canada National Debating Seminars. He also represented Manitoba in the National High School Debating Seminars in Halifax, where he qualified for the World Debating Seminars scheduled for Jerusalem in January 1998.

Last year, he won the World Public Speaking and Debating Championship, which was held in Buenos Aires March 18-25. This year, the competition was held in Botswana in southern Africa.

Rallies for Iranian Jews

Canada does not consider the case a purely internal matter, Peterson added. Quoting Czech Republic president Vaclav Havel, Peterson said human rights are more important than national sovereignty.

Canada's embassy in Tehran has already expressed its concerns to the Iranian Foreign Ministry, and it has been assured that the 13 would receive fair trials under Iranian law. "We insist that the trials take place quickly and in accord with all norms of international law," Peterson said.

Rabbi Amram Assayag, chief rabbi of the Sephardi Kehilla Centre, took a different approach to developments in Iran, likening them to ancient Persia and events described in the biblical book of Esther.

In ancient times, Haman tried to convince the Persian king, Achashverosh, that there would be few repercussions if he ordered the murder of all of Persia's Jews.

"I believe history is repeating itself," Rabbi Assayag said. None of the arguments advanced by Haman was accurate, and today Jews must use every resource they can muster to oppose Iran's anti-Semitic attack on its Jews, he said.

The world today is not anti-Semitic, he continued. "Today, there is great sensitivity to Jewish issues." Even in other Muslim countries, like his native Morocco, "there is great respect for Jews... [Iran] will have to learn that anti-Semitism is out. There is no room for it in our world.

"We must send a strong message to Khatami. We are no longer passive. We will not go to the slaughterhouse like sheep," Rabbi Assayag said.

In sweltering weather, 400 Montreal Jews and non-Jews of all ages called on Iran last Sunday to release the 13 Jews held under threat of execution on "trumped up" charges of spying, and to urge the Canadian government to impose sanctions on the "renegade" state until they are freed.

"Today, I am an Iranian Jew," said Dorothy Zalcman Howard, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), the main organizer of the rally held at Cote St. Luc's Centennial Park.

Similar rallies organized by CJC were being held the same day in Vancouver, Ottawa and Calgary, and the next day in Winnipeg, as part of a nationwide and international campaign to free the Iranian Jews, who include a 16-year-old boy, a rabbi and a mohel.

The hour-long event in the park's Butler Building featured placards bearing the prisoners' names and ages, and was electric in intensity and sense of urgency.

Rabbi Martin Penn, who was in the vanguard of CJC's activism on behalf of Soviet Jews, led 13 young, blindfolded people dressed in black across the stage, as speaker after speaker called for the prisoners' release.

The speakers included Zakki Ghavitian, an Iranian Jew and president of the Montreal Jewish-Iranian Association, who read from a letter sent to Khatami that referred to the "profound anxiety" of Iranian Jewry in light of the arrests.

Ghavitian announced that there would be a July 5 prayer vigil organized by local Iranian Jews, to be held at the Young Israel of Montreal synagogue.

The rally also included remarks by a Montreal Iranian Jew who, out of fear for the safety of his family members still in Iran, had his comments relayed to the crowd by CJC's Frank Schlesinger.

Two of the accused spies – Nasser Levi Haim and Shahrockh Paknachad – were respectively a teacher and classmate of the anonymous Montreal man. Both are devout and moral men, whose arrests are "outrageous, absurd and tragic," he said through Schlesinger.

CJC president Moshe Ronen said the Canadian government's position that the 13 Iranian Jews should be tried in Iranian courts is "unsatisfactory" to the CJC

"Canada wants due process to be followed, but we think it would be 'kangaroo courts' and not justice as we know it," Ronen told a recent meeting of the Ontario region executive.

The CJC position is that the Jewish prisoners should be freed and released to Israel, Ronen said.

"It is important that this be recognized as a human rights issue."

The well-attended executive meeting unanimously approved a motion that the Canadian government do all in its power to effect the speedy release of Jews and others imprisoned "under false and fabricated charges."

B'nai Brith Canada also held a noontime prayer vigil in downtown Toronto last Friday in support of the 13 imprisoned Jews.

Canadian role sought

OTTAWA — Syria has asked Canada to assume a central peacekeeping role should a peace deal with Israel over the Golan Heights be reached.

Farouk al-Shara, Syria's foreign minister, held talks last week here with Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, and requested that Canada play an important position if a deal is made on the Golan Heights' return.

Shara was in Ottawa to open Syria's first embassy in Canada. He said he had good talks with Chrétien, and hoped that Israel would return all of the Golan Heights.

Sophie Galarneau, a spokesperson for the prime minister's office, told The CJN that "until such time as a peace deal is reached [between Israel and Syria], any proposal is purely theoretical."

Syria believed softening its negotiation stance

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Syria has softened its stance on the conditions it views as necessary for the renewal of peace talks with Israel, according to messages Damascus has sent Washington in recent weeks. But Damascus remains insistent that the basis for negotiations must be an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights to pre-1967 borders.

Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak is expected to discuss ways to restart the talks during an upcoming visit to Washington.

In a message he communicated to the United States before the Israeli elections were held last month, Syrian President Hafez al-Assad declared his desire to renew talks with a Barak-headed government.

Assad spoke by telephone with U.S. President Bill Clinton after Barak was elected, and has met with western leaders in Damascus.

The Syrians want an American seal of approval for the offer they got from the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin – a full withdrawal from the Golan Heights, right down to the border that was in effect at the start of the Six Day War, in return for security arrangements and normalized relations.

During the tenure of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Assad demanded that he be given a letter from the United States outlining the withdrawal offer, as a condition for renewing talks. This time, the Syrians say they will be content to have Clinton outline the situation verbally.

Damascus has also asked Washington to make clear whether the U.S. administration has the necessary political drive to see the talks through to fulfilment.

The administration has promised that Clinton will work toward the attainment of peace until the last day of his term in January 2001.

The international border between Mandatory Palestine and Syria was set in 1923. But the 1949 armistice lines zigzagged across the 1923 border, creating a demilitarized zone over which sovereignty was to be determined in future territorial negotiations.

Given those territorial irregularities, a withdrawal to the pre-June '67 lines now would give the Syrians Hamat Gader and the cliffs above Lake Kinneret, allowing them access to the lakeshore and the eastern bank of the Jordan River where it passes through the mountains north of the Kinneret.

Hamat Gader is the only piece of the territory Syria is demanding that was part of Mandatory Palestine. Israeli sources say they believe Damascus will agree to a deal in which Syria gets Hamat Gader, and in return consents to stay away from the Kinneret's shore.

At the heart of the dispute over the renewal of talks lies the question of what Rabin offered Syria. American sources familiar with the details of Israeli-Syrian negotiations say former secretary of state Warren Christopher told Assad in July 1994 that "if Israel's demands on security arrangements and normalization are met, then it will agree to withdraw from the Golan Heights down to the line of June 4, 1967."

The Syrians claimed, after the fact, that they received an Israeli "commitment" to pull back to the pre-June '67 lines. But the American sources say there was no commitment, only a conditional offer which was an item on the agenda of the talks.

The demands Israel posed as a condition for withdrawal were not met by March 1996, when the talks broke off. According to the Israeli version, published by former U.S. ambassador to Israel Itamar Rabinovitch – who took part in the Rabin-Christopher talks and headed Israel's delegation to the talks with Syria – Rabin told Christopher in July '94 that he could tell Assad that he "got the impression" that Rabin would agree to withdraw to the pre-June '67 border if Israel's demands were met.

Life in the Iranian minefield

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Anyone who has thought about the arrest of a group of Jews in Iran on charges of spying for Israel and the United States can't help but wonder why Jews who live in a place where the ayatollahs determine how minorities shall be treated, and hand out death sentences to suit their religious and political purposes, would elect to put themselves at risk.

Analysis

For a Jew, living in today's Iran is like wandering in an unmarked minefield. President Mohammad Khatami's declaration that Iranian Jews enjoy full rights is worthless. Khatami has not managed to grant protection even to his close associates who have been put on trial.

One would have to be an idiot to believe that Israel would put the lives of 20,000 Iranian Jews – whose access to the Iranian government is nonexistent – at risk by recruiting them for espionage activity. At first, the Iranians arrested a larger group of Jews from Shiraz.

Israel was made aware of this, but it was decided not to make a big stir, in order to give reason a chance to prevail.

The silence did not help, and now, those arrested are being accused of spying and their lives are in danger. In Iran, where torture is common, any type of confession can be extracted in an interrogation.

All the facts attest that the Jews fell victim to the struggle going on in Iran between supporters of Khatami, who seek closer ties with the west, and their opponents from the camp of Iran's religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

It's a characteristic occurrence in despotic regimes, like those of Stalin and Saddam Hussein, for Jews to fall prey to a government's internal political struggles.

In Iran, they well know that harming Jews constitutes more than an offence to Israel. They know it will arouse Jewish communities around the world, as well as many people in the U.S. Congress and in various foreign ministries, to take action against Tehran.

This will, of course, foil Iran's rapprochement with the west, to the satisfaction of Khatami's adversaries. One might be tempted to conclude from this that the Iranian president is devoted to making peace with Israel. During his recent visit to Damascus, however, he did not neglect to tell Hezbollah leaders that the military struggle against Israel must continue.

When pressure to release the Jews mounted, Iran responded in typical fashion with a step meant to push the spotlight off of the Jews' arrest: It leaked that Tehran is interested in a special regional accord that would prevent the use of surface-to-surface missiles in the Middle East. More than actually talking about missiles, the Iranians accused Israel of every possible evil and misdoing, including missile production. Even though the chances for such an accord are quite slim, it was deserving of real discussion, but not merely as a move designed to divert attention from the bogus plot cooked up by the Iranians.

Even before the Jews were arrested on espionage charges, two conflicting phenomena were apparent among Iranians with respect to their attitudes toward Israel.

On the one hand, Iranian leaders held nothing back when it came to hurling accusations, such as one that Israel was meddling in the production of oil in the Caspian Sea with the aim of causing damage to Iran.

The other side of the coin is that various Iranians are now more willing than ever before to hold a dialogue with Israel on different topics.

The arrest of the Jews in Iran and the danger that their lives have been put in, could very well throw a wrench into this trend.

California rallies against hate after shul arsons

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — Under a giant banner reading Sacramento United Against Hate, some 4,000 citizens of all faiths and colors dedicated themselves to the fight against bigotry as their answer to arson attacks on three Sacramento-area synagogues.

More than 2,500 people crammed into the Community Centre Theatre last week, while 1,500 more listened in an overflow auditorium during a 2½-hour rally that many participants described as electric, and some called "the most emotional experience of my life."

The audience rose to its feet when California Lt.-Gov. Cruz Bustamante declared, "Tonight all of us belong to the three synagogues," and again when Sacramento Mayor Joe Serna said, "When I hear of synagogues burning, then I am a Jew."

Not far from the emotional scene, more than 100 federal agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the FBI were painstakingly combing the three synagogue sites for evidence to link the hate crimes to their perpetrators.

The predawn attacks on June 18 targeted Congregation B'nai Israel and Congregation Beth Shalom, both Reform temples, and the Kenesset Israel Torah Centre, an Orthodox synagogue. Total damage was estimated at close to $1 million.

At two of the sites, arsonists left leaflets that blamed the "International Jew World Order" and the "International Jews media" for the war in Kosovo.

"We are Slavs, we will never allow the International Jew World Order to take our Land," read one flier. "We fight to keep Serbia free forever."

Hardest hit was B'nai Israel in downtown Sacramento, whose library was gutted, ruining 5,000 books, some of them hundreds of years old. Also destroyed were 300 videotapes on Jewish history, which the congregation had been collecting for its 150th anniversary celebration in October.

B'nai Israel is believed to be the oldest American synagogue west of the Mississippi River.

At Beth Shalom, vandals broke in through a side window and started a fire on the bimah. Earlier this year, the temple's walls had been defaced by painted swastikas.

Kenesset Israel was the target of a Molotov cocktail, which had been lobbed through a sliding glass door.

Politicians swiftly condemned the attacks. The California State Assembly unanimously approved a resolution calling the fires one of the worst acts of anti-Semitism in American history. Vice-President Al Gore condemned the arsons as "cowardly."

To help meet the immediate needs of the three synagogues, more than $10,000 has been donated by organizations representing the Japanese and Chinese communities, Buddhist and Christian churches, political leaders and private citizens, the Sacramento Bee reported.

The federal Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) has offered low-interest loans to help the synagogues repair the damage, under the 1996 Church Arson Prevention Act. Andrew Cuomo, HUD's secretary, visited B'nai Israel with California governor Gray Davis and called it, "an attack against all Americans."

Other offers of help have arrived from all parts of the country. "We've been overwhelmed by offers of moral and financial support from as far away as New York and Florida," said a spokesperson at the Sacramento Jewish Federation.

Jews play significant role at South African inauguration

By SUZANNE BELLING
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JOHANNESBURG — Representatives of South Africa's Jewish community played prominent parts in the nation's recent peaceful transition of power.

Constitutional court president Judge Arthur Chaskalson administered the oath of office to President Thabo Mbeki, while Chief Rabbi Cyril Harris was one of five religious leaders to offer a prayer at the June 16 inauguration.

At the start of the ceremony, attended by 4,500 dignitaries – including kings, presidents and prime ministers from 130 countries – prayers were also said by clergy of the Christian, Muslim, Hindu and African traditional faiths.

In his benediction, Rabbi Harris asked for forgiveness for the failings of all South Africans.

"Instead of coming closer together as brothers and sisters of one land, we carry old hatreds in our hearts," he said, adding that "our country, at this time, has too much violence and too much crime, too little love and laughter."

In his inaugural address, Mbeki referred to Genesis 4:9, in which Cain gives his reply to God's question about his brother's whereabouts.

" I am my brother's keeper. I am my sister's keeper," Mbeki said. "And because we are one another's keepers, we surely must be haunted by the humiliating suffering which continues to afflict millions of our people.

"What the new light over our land must show is a palpable process of the comprehensive renewal of our country – its rebirth – driven by the enormous talents of all our people, both black and white."

Among those attending the inauguration were Libyan leader Muammar Khadafi and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat.

Israel was represented by its ambassador to South Africa, Uri Oren, who said there was no higher representation because the new Israeli government had not yet been formed.

"It is a very hectic time in Israel," Oren said. "It was bad coincidence that no high government official was able to represent the country. We made this clear to the Mbeki administration and they were very understanding."

South Africa's Jewish community was represented at the inauguration by three officials of its leading umbrella group, the South African Jewish Board of Deputies: national president Mervyn Smith, national chair Marlene Bethlehem and national director Seymour Kopelowitz.

Shortly after the inauguration, the Jewish board announced that Mbeki will open its national congress in Johannesburg on August 21.

Mbeki's new cabinet includes one Jewish minister, Ronnie Kasrils. As deputy minister of defence in the government of outgoing President Nelson Mandela, Kasrils was promoted to minister of water affairs and forestry.

Kasrils, former head of military intelligence of Umkhonto weSizwe, the armed wing of the African National Congress, was in exile for 27 years during the apartheid era.

On his return in 1990, he was one of the country's most wanted people before finally being granted amnesty.

He is the author of the book Armed and Dangerous, the story of the undercover struggle against apartheid.

Controversial letter by Cousteau found

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — The biographer of Jacques Cousteau has uncovered evidence that the late underwater explorer harbored anti-Semitic attitudes.

A letter written 58 years ago by Cousteau during the wartime rule of the pro-Nazi Vichy government was published last week in the French daily Le Monde, after it was found by the biographer.

The letter was published on the day Cousteau was eulogized at the Académie Française and immortalized in French cultural history.

Cousteau, then a 31-year-old naval officer, wrote to a friend on May 1, 1941, to say that he and his family could find nowhere suitable to live in Marseilles.

"There will be no decent apartment available until we have kicked out all these ignoble Yids who are burdening us," wrote Cousteau, who died two years ago.

Biographer Bernard Violet noted that Cousteau often made racist remarks in private, while writer Erik Orsenna, who delivered the Académie Française eulogy, told Le Monde that while the letter was "clearly ignoble," it reflected its times.

If all French correspondence from the era were to be re-read today, he said, "one would find a great deal of anti-Semitism of this kind."

The Week in Israel

• Scientists said they have developed a new way to accelerate tree and plant growth. The scientists, working at a branch of the Hebrew University in Rehovot, use gene splicing techniques to speed up plant growth by as much as 50 percent.

• Arab delegates refused to sit down with Israel at a UN meeting about the Y2K computer problem. The meeting was part of two days of sessions attended by representatives from more than 170 countries.

June 22

• The High Court rejected Mordechai Vanunu's request to be released from prison. Vanunu is serving an 18-year sentence for leaking Israeli nuclear secrets.

June 23

• Archeologists discovered a 2,000-year-old factory underneath Jerusalem that made tools for the Second Temple. An archeologist was quoted by Israel Television as saying the factory, in which tables and cups were also reportedly made, was located at the edge of the Old City.

June 24

• Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein and State Attorney Edna Arbel decided to close the investigation against Foreign Minister Ariel Sharon, who was being investigated for alleged bribery charges.

At least three Lebanese civilians were killed in the retaliatory attacks. It was the first time the Lebanese capital had been targeted by Israel since 1996. The air attacks were seen as a signal to Beirut and to Damascus that they had to rein in Hezbollah.

June 25

• More than 700 lawyers filed for unemployment benefits during the first five months of this year, an increase of 40 percent over last year.

Ties with U.S. high on Barak's agenda

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Once Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak forms a government, one of his first priorities will be to travel to Washington to improve relations with Israel's chief ally, the United States.

His predecessor, Benjamin Netanyahu, strained Israel's relationship with the United States to such a degree that Bill Clinton refused to invite him to the White House in the last year.

Netanyahu slammed Clinton's snub, describing it as conduct "unbecoming" a president. And while Clinton gave Netanyahu the cold shoulder, he received Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat no less than twice in the same period.

Looking back, one cannot but conclude that Netanyahu had only himself to blame for mismanaging Israel's pivotal friendship with the United States.

From the outset, he seemed to take it for granted. Within three months of assuming the premiership, he said that he would rather strain Israel's ties with the United States than give up too much territory to the Palestinians. The statement turned out to be a self-fulfilling prophecy.

Netanyahu clashed with Clinton on a number of separate but related issues integral to the Oslo peace process.

Israel's settlements beyond the Green Line, particularly those in the West Bank, were a chronic source of tension, and the issue constantly boiled over. Clinton called the settlements an absolute obstacle to peace. But Netanyahu, in deference to his core beliefs and his political survival, resisted pressure for a "time-out" on expanding the settlements.

As West Bank settlers established unauthorized new settlements on the eve of the May 17 Israeli election, the United States escalated its criticism. Dennis Ross, Clinton's special envoy to the Middle East, declared unequivocally that increased settlement activity was "very destructive to the pursuit of peace."

In a similarly harsh vein, the U.S. State Department publicly accused Netanyahu of reneging on a promise not to accelerate the pace of construction in the territories.

Openly defying Clinton's admonition to desist from "unilateral actions" which prejudge the outcome of talks with the Palestinians, Netanyahu took steps to build a new Jewish neighborhood in eastern Jerusalem's Har Choma district.

Israel's mounting differences with the United States were subsequently accentuated by Netanyahu's decision to extend Jerusalem's boundaries, demolish illegally built Arab residences in east Jerusalem, and close four Palestinian Authority offices there.

Despite the seriousness of these disagreements, the greatest problems were touched off by Washington's efforts to secure a further Israeli pullout from the West Bank.

The United States suggested a 13 percent withdrawal, prompting two sharp responses from Israel. Netanyahu said that he would not kowtow to an American "diktat," while his communications advisor, David Bar-Ilan, completely ruled out a redeployment of this scope on security grounds.

In the end, Netanyahu accepted Washington's demand, as embodied in the October 1998 Wye memorandum. But no sooner had Israel made the first of three phased withdrawals than Netanyahu charged the Palestinians with failing to abide by the accord, and froze the process.

Pointedly enough, the United States rejected Israel's argument that the Palestinian Authority was not in compliance with Wye. Washington not only urged Israel to implement it, but held up the transfer of $1.2 billion in special aid Israel had been promised if the agreement was fully implemented.

Israel's running disputes with the United States, however bitter, did not affect the close partnership the two countries enjoy and have enjoyed for decades now.

At the United Nations, the United States continued to veto Security Council resolutions critical of Israel. Last November, Israel and the United States signed a memorandum of agreement which further strengthens their strategic relationship. Nevertheless, Barak has some important fence mending to do in Washington.

Israeli envoy creates furor in Lithuania

BY LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — Once again, Israel's ambassador to Lithuania has managed to raise the hackles of many of that Baltic nation's politicians.

And once again, he touched on the same hot-button accusation: that Lithuania's poor record of prosecuting suspected Nazi war criminals proves that the country has turned into a haven for Nazi collaborators.

Oded Ben Hur, who is based in the Latvian capital of Riga and serves as Israel's envoy to the three Baltic nations, said Lithuania – as well as Latvia and Estonia – would find it difficult to integrate into the new Europe if they fail to cope with their wartime past and publicly acknowledge their roles in the Holocaust.

His comments, made this week at a dinner organized by the Lithuanian Jewish community for a visiting U.S. Jewish delegation, prompted some Lithuanian politicians to call for his removal.

The vice chair of the Lithuanian Parliament, Romualdas Ozolas, later told reporters that Ben Hur was attempting "to pit Jews and Lithuanians against each other and to discredit the Lithuanian state."

Ben Hur's accusation echoed a statement made last week by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, which charged that Lithuania has become Europe's leading haven for Nazi collaborators.

The accusations against Lithuania are far from new.

In September 1997, when Ben Hur made a similar call for Lithuania to stop dragging its feet on war crimes prosecutions, a comparable furor erupted.

At that time, Lithuania's Parliament delayed action on amendments to the country's criminal code that would have facilitated the investigation of alleged World War II criminals.

Prominent Lithuanian politicians issued calls not to cave into pressure from international Jewish organizations, and also demanded that Ben Hur be stripped of his diplomatic credentials.

During the Nazi occupation of Lithuania from 1941 to 1944, approximately 94 percent of Lithuania's prewar Jewish community of 240,000 died in the Holocaust.

Historians say the scale of the tragedy could have been smaller had ordinary Lithuanians not helped with the killings.

Since Lithuania regained independence from the Soviet Union in 1991, it has not prosecuted any of the alleged Nazi collaborators living there.

Students in grades 4 to 7 at Ahavat Yisrael Hebrew School took part in the school's recent Torah Fair.. Parents and students were invited to the fair. Little Yussel went fishing, and look what he caught

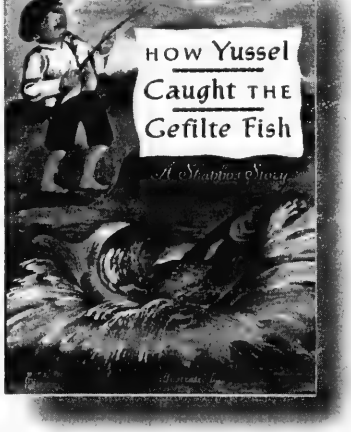
By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Do you like gefilte fish? Most people do. Before there were food processors, people used to grind their own fish, add eggs, bread crumbs or matzah meal, spices, and sometimes sugar, and form them into patties or balls. Boy, were they yummy!

Yussel, the little boy in How Yussel Caught the Gefilte Fish; a Shabbos Story, by Charlotte Herman, illustrated by Katya Krenina (Duttons Childrens Books, 1999) really really loved the gefilte fish his mother used to make for Shabbat. What made the dish even more special, was that Yussel's father used to catch the fish in the river.



Yussel couldn't wait until he was old enough to go with his father to catch the fish. Finally, one Friday morning, his father woke him up very early, and took him to the river.

Father showed Yussel how to put bait on the fishing pole. The best kind of bait, he said, was challah, cheese and (yuck!) worms. Then he showed him how to sit patiently until a fish came to eat the bait.

Well, they had very good luck. At least, Yussel did – he caught a carp, a trout and a pike. But there was a problem. They didn't look at all like gefilte fish. They had heads, and fins, and scales. Some even had spots. Yussel was very upset.

Even though his parents told him that the fish would become gefilte fish, Yussel kept worrying.

Do you know how the fish turned into gefilte fish? Do you know the special spice Yussel's mother used to make the gefilte fish even more special?

Katya Krenina's pictures are lovely. She uses a lot of soft colors – blues, greens and yellows to show the countryside and the river. When it comes time for the Shabbat part of the story, brighter colors, especially purples and oranges, are used to show the difference between Shabbat and the rest of the week.

Jewish medical ethics explored at symposium

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish medical ethics take a somewhat different approach to prolonging life than that represented by the professional or secular view.

This was the summation of Dr. Michael Gordon, ethics committee chair, and Rabbi Norman Berlat, both of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, at a symposium on Controversies in Medical Ethics for health professionals at the Baycrest's Wagman Centre.

"The issue of quality has lower value than the sanctity of life within Judaism," said Gordon, who chaired the symposium. "Autonomy is not paramount. Physician-assisted suicide and euthanasia are completely forbidden."

Gordon told of a 79-year-old non-observant Hungarian woman who refused kidney dialysis, even though she was at death's door. When all other arguments failed, Gordon said he asked the woman to accept dialysis "for me," since he cared what happened to her. She agreed on a three-month trial basis, and went on to live another four years.

"I was lambasted severely at the time for interfering with her autonomy," Gordon said.

Another case reported to a symposium workshop by Gordon and Rabbi Berlat involved an observant 75-year-old man with a chronic psychiatric history. His sister, who had decision-making authority, asked the hospital staff not to let him know that his brother, whom he had met in the Baycrest shul every Saturday and who was a resident at Baycrest, had died. She based her request on advice from a rabbi.

Though the staff demurred, Rabbi Berlat said the sister's request was in accordance with Jewish medical ethics. Most of the workshop members, however, disagreed with the decision.

If family members include doctors and lawyers, especially those from out of town, there are additional complications when considering life-saving measures, Gordon said.

He told of a seriously ill 82-year-old woman suffering from dementia who needed to be fed through a tube. Her daughter refused to permit the insertion of a new tube to replace the leaking one, citing her mother's wishes. The brother, a lawyer, disagreed with his sister, but they agreed to take time to think it over. In the meantime, Gordon said, a way to repair the leaking tube was found, and they agreed that the woman would be transferred to Mount Sinai Hospital for a new tube and quickly brought back to Baycrest. However, just before the transfer, the woman died.

Doctors who face opposition from family members on their treatment plans should remove themselves from the case and seek the services of a bioethicist, lawyer William Carter, of Borden and Elliot, told a symposium plenary.

"You will find yourself in the middle of a fight between siblings," he advised.

When Gordon said he is often faced with the threat of "I'll sue you" from a family member, Carter said it was "an empty threat" that the family member could not carry out quickly.

"Dangerous" was the term used by Dr. Paul Root Wolpe in the plenary to describe the actions taken by a hospital staff to remove a dying patient to make room for another patient. "That is an inappropriate mechanism," he said.

An associate at the Centre for Bioethics, University of Pennsylvania, Wolpe said it is necessary for Jewish medical halachic ethics to be clearly spelled out in secular terms for family members and hospital staff.

"Patient consent is the gold standard of bioethics," he said.

If physician-assisted suicide ever becomes law in Ontario, as it is in Oregon, it will pose a great problem for Baycrest staff, Gordon said.

Six other states are considering such legislation, he said, adding that all the proposals have some protection against involuntary use.

Dr. Amitai S. Oberman of Israel was presented with the Nicholas M. and Hedy J. Munk Award for physicians under age 40 who demonstrate special merit in geriatrics. Currently studying at Harvard, Oberman plans to return to Israel to develop geriatric services at the Ha'emek Medical Centre.

Climbers raising funds for neuro-degenerative diseases

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a bid to raise $50,000 for research on neurodegenerative diseases, four amateur climbers from Toronto recently set out to climb one of the highest peaks in North America.

They prepared for their assault on Mount Ranier, south of Seattle, through a rigorous training schedule that called for them to climb 53 storeys in the Toronto-Dominion Centre four times in a row (212 storeys), loaded with 50-pound packs and ankle weights. With great determination, they did this twice a week.

Half the amount raised for research will go to the Hospital for Sick Children.

Some of the funds will be used to devise a system for delivery to certain parts of the brain of synthetic molecules thought to be useful in attacking certain neurodegenerative disorders.

Canavan disease, which has high carrier rate (about one in 33) in the Ashkenazi Jewish population, will be one of those targeted.

Other neurodegenerative diseases that will benefit from the funds raised are Parkinson, Alzheimer, Huntingtons and epilepsy.

The four men, Jeff Fisher, Dave Fowler, Eddie Carolan and Kent Sheppard, undertook a rigorous nine-month physical and technical training program. They have children of their own and say they want to protect them from these diseases.

The men range in age from 37 to 47 and got their inspiration when they read Into Thin Air, a book about climbing Mount Everest.

An experienced team of climbers from Vancouver volunteered to partner and guide the Toronto men on their three-day expedition.

Love of maps a tradition in the Perly family

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

What do taxi drivers, ambulance drivers, police officers, real estate agents, salespeople and motorists have in common?

Perly street guides.

They're especially useful if you're directionally challenged.

Perly International Inc., which marks its 50th anniversary this year, is something of a household name in Ontario and Quebec, where its publications are widely sold and appreciated.

Headed by 25-year-old James Perly, who inherited it from his father in 1997, the company publishes an array of street guides, customized map books and CD-ROMs of greater Toronto, Montreal and Quebec City.

In the future, Perly may yet expand to the rest of Canada. "But our current focus is the Golden Horseshoe," said Perly, referring to the heavily populated region from Toronto to Niagara Falls.

Perly's most successful and enduring guide, the wire-bound book of Toronto and vicinity, graced by a red leatherette cover with gold-stamped lettering, is now in its 41st edition.

It's a meticulously produced work of the mapmaker's craft. Every street is fully indexed with map co-ordinates, postal areas and municipalities, and there is information on schools, hospitals, hotels and shopping centres. In the back of the book is a fold-out map of Toronto and environs and a highly detailed blowup of Toronto's downtown core.

Spinoff products include the large print, easy-to-read version, as well as the handy pocket-size edition with its orange cover that fits snugly into a glove compartment.

In 1995, Perly's father, Gary, who died 2½ years ago, introduced CD-ROMs. "He was originally a system analyst at IBM, and had a strong leaning for digital mapping."

CD-ROMs, Perly said, are typically used by salesmen and real estate agents to chart territory. "They're very useful. With a click of the mouse, they can locate any street in Toronto. And you can print maps of your choice off the computer."

By popular demand, Perly plans soon to unveil its newest products, 3 x 4 and 5 x7 wall maps of Toronto. The smaller map provides an overview of the city, while the bigger one is far more detailed.

"Maps," said Perly, "should be legible and pleasing to the eye, to be used functionally and decoratively."

James Perly, president of Perly International Inc.

It's a credo that his grandparents, Al and Belle, the founders of Perly, clearly understood.

They started the business in 1949 by publishing maps of Ontario's cottage country. A year later, the Perlys published the Bluemap Atlas, supposedly the first road atlas of Toronto.

"It was a good business to get into," said Perly, whose family name was originally Pearlstein. "There has always been a love of maps in the family."

Al and Belle worked out of a house on Eglinton Avenue West, where Perly's is still located. The store was on the ground level, the living quarters above.

"My grandparents' master bedroom is now my office," said Perly, a friendly, casually dressed man, who started working for the company when he was 12 and continued to do so during summer breaks.

"My grandfather used to make the deals and brainstorm in the back room. He was more of a businessman than a mapmaker. My grandmother handled the finances and the marketing. In those days, they used to ride around in cabs checking the streets every night. Today, we do it in pairs in our own cars."

Al died when Perly was very young, but Belle stayed on for many more years, helping her son Gary, who took over in 1981.

In December 1996, while on a business trip to China, Gary was stricken with pneumonia. He immediately returned home, only to discover that he had inoperable cancer. He died about a month later at the age of 53.

Before he died, he asked James, his only child, to succeed him. James was then a third-year psychology student at York University, who looked forward to finishing his degree and doing "my own thing" for a few years after graduation.

"Father's death was a terrible shock and extremely stressful, to say the least. I had to go through a transition from student to company president.

"I had no time to adjust. I went right to the top, though I had a good knowledge of how to work. I really enjoyed my university studies, but I always knew I'd eventually go into business."

He credits Perly's employees with helping him through this traumatic period of grief and adjustment.

"We have good management here. They kept things running, and have been training me for the past two years."

His mother Caroline, who is not in the business, was also supportive. "She helped by being motherly, I guess."

Perly, a bachelor, has no plans at present to complete his degree in psychology. However, he has attended night classes in business administration.

As president, he fulfils two major roles. "I provide a vision and make sure we're sticking to it, and I keep everything working. I'm a jack-of-all-trades here, and I can pretty much do any job."

Perly's employs 25 workers in sales, administration and production. Five are cartographers.

They have their hands full, since there are always more streets, avenues and roads to be added. In the 1999 guides, for example, Toronto has 13 new streets; Oakville, 54; Vaughan, 90, Richmond Hill, 100; Scarborough, 10; Markham, 73; Brampton, 51; Mississauga, 65; Whitby, 35; North York, nine.

"The better the economy, the greater number of new streets there are to be added," said Perly.

Not surprisingly, Perly has competitors breathing down its neck. Indeed, by his reckoning, Toronto has the most competitive map market in the world.

Rand McNally, an American firm, sells Allmaps in Canada, while an Oshawa firm publishes Mapart.

The competition, though, doesn't worry Perly in the slightest.

"We're number 1 by far," he claimed. "Ours is the book of choice, the industry standard."

Multi-talented singer offers audience eclectic repertoire

Singer Lenka Lichtenberg

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Lenka Lichtenberg had the capacity audience clapping and singing at her recent concert, sponsored by Friends of Yiddish.

Singing in Yiddish, English, Russian, Ladino and Hebrew, the Toronto singer, songwriter, musician and teacher, performed Middle Eastern rhythms, Yiddish folk music, klezmer tunes, jazz improvisations and contemporary music.

Accompanied by a seven-piece band, Lichtenberg presented original songs in English, and Jewish songs including Tum-Balalayka and Vu Is Dos Gesele.

The concert, held at the Studio Theatre of the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, marked the release of Lichtenberg's first CD, Deep Inside, a collection of five Yiddish songs, one Ladino/Hebrew song and six of her original compositions in English.

Her recording was produced by Juno award-winning producer and musician, Ken Whiteley, and the CD showcases three arrangements by David Buchbinder of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band.

Lichtenberg was born and raised in Prague, Czechoslovakia, and became a recording artist, working in television and theatre.

She came to Canada in 1981, and in Vancouver, she continued to perform and study music. Ten years ago, she met and married Rubin Cohen and came to live in Toronto. They have three children who attend Bialik Hebrew Day School.

In Toronto, she received a master's degree at York University where the topic of her thesis was Yiddish folk music. She currently teaches music at Ryerson Polytechnic University.

She sang with Zalmen Mlotek at the Yiddish Festival in Queens, N.Y., performed at the Ashkenaz Festival last year, and will be featured again this year. She has presented several solo performances in Prague.

Speaking of her mother, who was a Holocaust survivor, she said that her composition, Child of Survivors, is an interpretation of what a child ponders as a survivor of the Holocaust.

A song entitled, One Day A Conversation, is about her craving for understanding between secular and religious Jews.

She played the piano as well as the guitar for several songs.

CJN Rosh Hashanah Photo Contest

The CJN announces its fifth annual Rosh Hashanah photo contest. We are asking readers to submit their own original photographs either of Israel or on any Jewish theme in their community.

Anyone can enter except CJN employees or members of their families.

A maximum of three photos per entrant may be submitted. Please write your name, address and phone number on the back of each photo. We can only return the photos if you provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

You may mail or deliver your photos to: The CJN Rosh Hashanah Contest, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, Aug. 16, 1999.

The judges will choose three photographs which, in their opinion, are the most expressive and evocative. These three photos will be published in The CJN Rosh Hashanah issue, Sept. 9, 1999. Each of the "winning" photographers will receive a cheque for $100.

We will undoubtedly receive many worthy submissions. But only three will be selected as the "winners." The decisions of the judges will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

Winning entrants will be notified by telephone before Shabbat on Aug. 27, 1999.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Musician incorporates Torah ideals

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Singer/songwriter Laurence Kosoy recently released his second CD, Return, based on the journey in search of his Jewish roots.

Kosoy says the nine songs in the album are on one basic theme: "Calling to young and old people to see life, not just as a place for pleasures, but as an opportunity to commit ourselves to inner growth and spiritual development."

He questions, he says, whether "we really and truly have given our Jewish past an honest and thorough exploration."

Kosoy, born in Toronto, attended Forest Hill Collegiate Institute, and studied history and music at Concordia University. Now an observant Jew, he says he began the search for his roots by travelling to eastern countries, "because it is more appealing to go outside yourself in your search."

In India, Kosoy says, he spoke to a non-Jewish social worker, who was interested in helping the poor and doing meditation, and the social worker told him about his four month visit to Israel.

"His interest in Israel made me think that I should go to Israel to explore my Judaism." In 1998, he spent 2½ months there.

"I discovered that Judaism was a good balance between the spiritual and physical/material world."

Music, he says, became an expression of where he was, and where he was heading. "Torah observant Judaism is the culmination of my searching and discovery."

Music, he adds, incorporates Torah ideals, and expresses to others the beauty and richness of authentic Judaism. "I believe that if people were presented with a true and authentic living Judaism, perhaps they would also be drawn to what I consider the ultimate lifestyle."

Return has songs related to spirituality, personal growth and healing. Some song titles are, Know Yourself, Stop Looking Down the Road, Rise Above It, Fearless People and Thank You.

Kosoy, who will be returning to Israel to continue his studies, has performed at many Toronto bars and clubs, and makes regular appearances at the Free Times Cafe. He has given concerts in Japan and Indonesia, and most recently he performed to a sell-out crowd at England's oldest acoustic coffee house, Bunjies in London.

His 1996 CD, Patience with The Ordinary was well received, and one of his compositions placed in the top 300 selections out of more than 3,000 entries from some 20 countries in the Unisong International Song Contest.

Kosoy's CDs are available at Negev Bookstore, HMV Superstore, and on the Internet at www.tara.com.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

The Klezmer Conservatory Band is one of many bands participating in this years Ashkenaz Festival.

EXPLOSION OF KLEZMER CULTURE

Over 175 artists from 10 countries are coming to Toronto to perform at this year's Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture, set to take over Harbourfront Centre from Aug. 30 to Sep. 6.

Although most of the 110 scheduled events are free, tickets are already on sale for a host of cultural events, including what is being billed as the "musical centrepiece" of the festival, two performances by the 20-piece Ashkenaz Orchestra Project (AOP).

In seven new compositions, the ensemble will explore the dynamic fusion of klezmer, new music, jazz, Middle Eastern and Roma music. (The AOP performs Sept. 1 at 10 p.m. and Sept. 2 at 8 p.m.; tickets are $15.)

Under the direction of Toronto musician David Buchbinder, this third biennial incarnation of Ashkenaz is the most ambitious ever. It's being called the "largest Jewish cultural festival in the world."

Boston's Klezmer Conservatory Band launches the musical excitement on Aug. 30, 8 p.m. (tickets $20 in advance).

Other ticketed musical events are headlined by trumpeter Dave Douglas, Downbeat's 1998 artist of the year, with a special ensemble; Brave Old World, performing songs from the Lodz ghetto; the Ashkenaz Fidl Kapelye, a troupe of klezmer fiddlers "whose sizzling dance sounds and mystical meditations haven't been heard [in this world] in 100 years;" the New Jewish Chorale/Toronto Jewish Folk Choir, presenting the musical legacy of the Bund; and Marty Ehrlich and the Dark Woods Ensemble, combining klezmer and John Coltrane.

A major literary event entitled Re-Imagining the Shtetl features writers Yehuda Elberg, novelist Lilian Nattel and Yaffa Eliach (Sept. 1, 8 p.m., $8.) The Reel Ashkenaz film programme, meanwhile, presents treasures from the golden age of Yiddish cinema.

Regrettably, only a small part of Ashkenaz' astonishing line-up of talent can be mentioned here. But look for the ultra-colorful Ashkenaz parade, late-night cabaret, numerous children's events, display of Judaic treasures, many workshops and forums, theatre events, and the Fresser's Paradise Food Tent, which will offer some kosher products.

For more information, call 973-3000; for tickets, 973-4000. Or visit the Web sites at www.ashkenaz.org or www.harbourfront.on.ca.

Winning Playwright: The Jewish Theatre Committee of Toronto has awarded Vern Thiessen, a drama instructor at the University of Alberta, first prize in this year's Canadian Jewish Playwriting Contest.

The winning play, Einstein's Gift, looks at the life of the Nobel Prize-winning chemist and Nazi victim, Fritz Haber.

The prodigiously talented Haber, who was Jewish, converted to Christianity and became one of Germany's best-known chemists. Eventually, confronted with Hitler's anti-Jewish decrees, he was forced to make some wrenching choices.

"I was fascinated by the moral and religious dilemmas that Haber confronted," said Thiessen, who added that his own background as a Mennonite on the Canadian Prairies gave him a special insight into religious prejudice and discrimination.

Einstein's Gift is slated to premiere during the committee's 1999-2000 season of staged readings, which will also include two former contest winners. "The submissions are always of a very high calibre, and this year is no exception," said committee chair, Ralph Wintrob.

War Orphans Wanted: Between 1947 and 1949, the Canadian Jewish Congress brought 1,123 boys and girls, orphans and survivors, to new lives in Canada. Now one of the orphans, Jack Kuper, filmmaker and author of the renowned memoir Child of the Holocaust, is preparing to make Children of the Storm, a television documentary about this fragment of Canadian history.

Kuper is seeking other war orphans, foster parents, government works, social workers, Congress volunteers, teachers, community members, and others who can shed light on the subject and wish to be interviewed. Ryerson grad eyes career as TV personality

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

TORONTO — Adam Schachter has never abandoned his dream of becoming a TV personality in entertainment journalism.

"I've learned to be patient and persistent," says Schachter, 23, who is still looking for his big break in the business.

The Toronto native has worked for the Toronto Raptors and rock radio station Q107, and did an internship will Hard Copy, an American tabloid journalism show.

Schachter says he first thought about a summer internship when a visitor came to speak to his Radio and Television Arts (RTA) class at Ryerson Polytechnic University.

"She spoke about working for CNN Jerusalem," says Schachter, "which would be an ideal job."

After his first year of university, he applied to various shows to become an intern, and landed a position at Hard Copy in Los Angeles. At 19, he flew to Paramount Studios for several memorable months, working without pay.

Schachter first chased story leads. He investigated some that were as ludicrous as "a dog flying out a window," he says.

Then a producer took a liking to him, and Schachter became an assistant producer. His experiences included shooting footage on the Baywatch beach and covering the O.J. Simpson trial.

"I'll never forget having breakfast with some dismissed jurors at the heart of the trial," he recalls.

Schachter also worked for the Toronto Raptors as an attendant at the visiting locker room, where he smoked cigars with Michael Jordan and sneaked hamburgers to Shaquille O'Neal before a game.

Schachter thinks Toronto is the city for him. "Right here, it's great. Next to L.A. and New York, Toronto is the place to be for entertainment."

Schachter graduated from the RTA program at Ryerson last April.

"Ryerson rounded me out," he says. "In TV, it's important to know everything and Ryerson gave me the technical skills. Although I'm not on the technical side, I know about audio, lighting and camera work."

Music video

Schachter has had a varied career to date. He acted in an amateur film, appeared in a Liza Minelli music video and was a DJ for a Toronto entertainment company for eight years. He worked as an entertainer and assistant cruise director for Princess Cruises, where, he says, he got paid to travel from Alaska to the Caribbean over to Hawaii, Tahiti and Bora Bora.

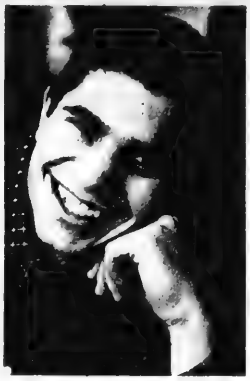
Schachter remembers the wonderful Pesach seder he attended during a cruise from Hawaii to Tahiti. "Here we are, in the middle of the Pacific," he says, smiling. "There were 45 people and even a rabbi on board."

Schachter is currently working for his father's marketing company, but an agent is trying to land him TV or commercial roles. However, he says it's not easy.

"Entertainment is a tough business to break into." You need to follow up on every phone call without being obnoxious, he says.

The reality of show business is that people look out for themselves, but people are also out there to help you, says Schachter.

"You have to have confidence and personality or else you'll get stepped on."



Adam Schachter.

Studio 2 to feature Zukerman profile

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Pinchas Zukerman has proven himself as a great violin soloist. Now, as music director of the National Arts Centre Orchestra in Ottawa, he is being challenged to prove his mettle as a conductor.

On Tuesday, July 6 at 8 p.m., the reincarnated Zukerman is the subject of a profile by TVOntario's Studio 2, hosted by Steve Paikin and Paula Todd.

Born in Israel, Zukerman, 50, is one of the stellar musicians of our time. A two-time Grammy-Award winner who has recorded 100 albums, he has a cadre of faithful fans stretching from Australia to Zimbabwe.

As he reminisces, he recalls that his parents wanted him to pursue "a tangible profession" in law or medicine. He obviously disappointed them, but they are doubtless proud Jewish parents today. "I'm doing OK," he says in an understatement.

Unfortunately, we learn substantially little about his life and career in this sketchy segment.

We're told that he went to the United States at age 14 to hone his skills, but nothing more is said about his development as a world-class artist.

Pianist Mark Niekrug suggests that Zukerman is not rigid in his musical tastes. But he does not elaborate.

The Ottawa Citizen critic expresses disappointment with Zukerman's supposed neglect of "new Canadian music." Yet details are sorely lacking.

Zukerman is portrayed as a person with an amazing ability to focus. But the point goes unillustrated.

As he talks, Zukerman voices admiration for the soaring talents of the great classical music composers. But he does not flesh out this important theme.

What does come across clearly and unambiguously is Zukerman's joie de vivre.

The man is bubbly, alive and vital. He clearly loves to hold forth in lively conversations.

Regrettably, however, he is given insufficient scope for the rhetorical flights of fancy that could have enriched this profile considerably.

Tutankhamen exhibit featured at Cairo museum

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

CAIRO – Cairo's Egyptian Museum is a one-of-a-kind repository, a treasure trove of antiquities which summons up the glories of ancient Egypt.

In this dusty, dimly-lit museum, the quantity as well as the quality of the exhibits – approximately 140,000 – inspire awe.

The piece de resistance, of course, is the Tutankhamen exhibit, spread throughout 12 rooms on the second floor.

But one is also impressed by the elegant jewelry, the alabaster vases and bowls, the clay tablets adorned with hieroglyphics, the life-like statuettes, the eerie funerary masks, the weathered mummies, and the caskets in which they rested for thousands of years.

The steles, the upright stone slabs and pillars bearing inscriptions or designs which commemorate stellar events, command much interest. One that particularly caught my eye chronicles the persecution of the Hebrews by the Pharaoh Ramses II. His mummy can be seen in the special mummy room.

Housed in a neo-classical building in bustling central Cairo, the museum traces Egypt's history from pharaonic times (3000-341 BCE) and Greek rule (332 to 30 BCE) to the Roman and Byzantine eras (30 BCE to 638 CE).

Its collection of pharaonic artifacts is far and away the greatest in the world.

All but one are authentic – the famous black basalt Rosetta Stone, discovered by the French in 1799 and deciphered by Jean-Francois Champollion. The original is in London's British Museum.

The contents of Tutankhamen's tomb, uncovered by the British archeologist Howard Carter in 1922 in Luxor's Valley of the Kings, are nothing short of splendid.

In the pantheon of pharaohs, Tutankhamen was an insignificant king. But because he was the only pharaoh whose tomb was not raided by grave robbers, the glittering artifacts Carter found created a universal sensation which has yet to subside.

Tutankhamen's beaten gold mask, his golden sandals, rings and bracelets, and the coffins which bore his remains are simply spellbinding.

But so, too, are his chariot (fashioned from wood, bronze and ivory), his intricately-carved ceremonial shields, his wooden household chest, his ostrich-feather fan, his gold-coated throne decorated with semi-precious stones, glass and silver, his oil-burning lamps, his miniature boats and his bed (supported by the elongated bodies of two stylistic cows).

Beyond Tutankhamen, the museum offers a kaleidoscopic array of fantastic relics. They range from a stele of the legendary Nefertiti posing informally with her husband and daughters to an assemblage of mummified animals, biscuits and loaves of bread.

In another corner, I saw small boxes of dried juniper berries, melon and barley seeds and dessicated dates.

There was still more as I wandered through the halls – funerary masks and papyri from the Greco-Roman period, the sarcophagus of a royal scribe, an ensemble of kitchen ware, arrows and arrow heads, axes and hoes, the discolored linen of an unwrapped mummy, clay tablets of official correspondence between Egypt and neighboring states, and a limestone latrine seat.

As I rounded a bend, I came face to face with a granite stele dedicated by Ptolemy to Alexander II, the son of Alexander the Great.

Although the museum is extraordinary by any yardstick, it is not without its deficiencies.

Labels are sometimes hard to read due to poor lighting and positioning. And some exhibits are not even labelled. Occasionally, you're left with the feeling that this is a warehouse and not a museum.

Cognizant of these drawbacks, the Ministry of Culture wants to build a new Egyptian Museum near the pyramids, but lacks the funds to do so.

Security around the museum is tight, following a spate of Islamic fundamentalist terrorist attacks which targeted tourists between 1992 and 1997. In fact, the museum was the site of an incident in which nine Germans and their Egyptian driver were killed.

The sight of soldiers cradling AK-47 Kalashnikov machine-guns can be unsettling. But once you step inside the museum, leaving the grime and grit and everyday problems of Egypt behind, you're transported into a realm of unsurpassed beauty.

Israel on verge of qualifying for European Championship

By ELLIOT HOOL and ASHER GOLDBERG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Israel's national soccer team stands at the dawn of the most glorious chapter in its history after a 5-0 crushing of visiting Austria in a Group 6 European Championship qualifier in Ramat Gan recently.

The result – undoubtedly the best ever by the national side in an official game – takes Israel into second place in Group 6 and gives national team head coach Shlomo Sharf and his players a golden opportunity to qualify for the European Championships (Euro 2000) in Holland and Belgium next summer. Israel's on-field performance even hints at the possibility of slipping past Spain to take the group outright and qualify automatically.

Eyal Berkovic scored two goals and set up another, but the statistics are only a small part of the story of his contribution. The West Ham midfielder has never played better in a blue shirt, and was a constant nightmare for the Austrians, who apart from kicking him, had no weapon to deal with his genius.

At the same time, only yards away, Haim Revivo, reportedly linked to Barcelona in a possible $13 million move, showed the Spanish team's coach, Louis van Gal, that it would be money well spent as he broke from constantly tormenting the right side of the Austrian defence, only to score a first-half injury time free-kick.

Israel led 2-0 at half time and put Austria away in the second half with another Berkovic goal and two more from Alon Mizrahi and Najwan Grayeb.

Berkovic was not surprised by his own, or his team's performance. Admitting it was "one of his finest displays for the national team," he said he had always believed it would happen. "I said that I would lead the team to victory and that's just what I did."

Captain Tal Banin was visibly moved after the match. "I am proud to be captain of the national team ...with this team everything is possible," he said in the dressing room, adding, "now we must qualify for Euro 2000."

All those involved in the national team are talking openly about Israel's very realistic chances of qualifying, be it via the top spot in Group 6 or via a nerve-racking playoff.

The national squad now has three months to prepare itself for the next, vital game – in Nicosia, against Cyprus. Victory would ensure second place in the group, leaving Sharf and his men to gear up for the next two games: the 'little clash' against San Marino followed by the 'giant clash' against Spain.

Sharf was the recipient of hundreds of congratulatory telegrams, telephone calls and personal visits following the win over Austria. He spent almost the entire day granting interviews to every imaginable branch of the media.

It was as if Israel was celebrating Independence Day all over again.

It is clear that the day after such a huge victory over Austria was always meant to be one big party. Some of the players left Israel for a well-earned vacation in the United States, while others preferred to take their vacations in Israel. Some went straight back to work, fulfilling their league commitments to their various European club sides.

With a realistic chance of qualifying for Euro 2000, competition for a place on Israel's squad is expected to be stiffer than ever.

For the Austria game, Jan Talesnikov and Shay Holtzman were not even required to don their kits. And now Avi Nimny, Ronen Harazi and Walid Badir look set to rejoin their national team colleagues. Sharf faces an unenviable selection headache, which will cause him many sleepless nights before he decides on his final line-up to face the Cypriots.

Sharf looks set to cancel the planned training camp, which was to be held in early August, because of Hapoel Haifa's participation in the qualifying rounds of the European Champions League (on July 28 and August 4).

Sharf was the model of patriotic optimism concerning Israel's chances of qualifying for Euro 2000, for the first time in its history.

"Currently," Sharf said, "Israel is one of the best teams in Europe. We can compete, without fear, against any other nation on the continent. Our goal is to qualify for Euro 2000 by taking first place in the group, but to do so, we will have to beat Spain on the road. I believe that, with just a little luck and with the same level of play we displayed [against Austria], we can beat any team in a playoff."

Sharf also gave his players a resounding vote of confidence. "I believe in my players. We need to be focused, serious minded, and for the time being, concentrate our thoughts on Cyprus. That is our utmost priority right now."

Sharf singled out Israel's European contingent – Berkovic, Banin, Revivo, Mizrachi and Alon Hazan – for special praise.

"They proved they have matured. They joined the national team and they made a difference. They drove the rest of the players forward with their will to win and the concentration. No one wanted to be left behind. These players put in a huge amount of work in training."

The national team coach, who has caused no end of raised eyebrows over his tactical decisions in the past, allowed himself to feel vindicated by the result against Austria.

"I am delighted that the calculated decision to play Yossi Abuksis in midfield, alongside Banin, paid off. This is a great day for Israeli soccer, especially as the entire country is caught up in the celebrations."

Banin also believes Israel won't be waving the white flag before the game against Spain. Against Austria, Banin was one of Israel's star performers. Throughout the 90 minutes, he was always in motion, snuffing out any Austrian offensive before it caught fire and helping out the forwards by ably aiding Berkovic and Revivo.

"We were very tense before the game," he said. "In the past, our nervousness would have made us jittery and [would] harm our play. But now go into the game very well prepared and self-assured."

"I am sure we will finish at least in second place," Banin said. "I hope we can do something in the game against Spain. It is true that we have progressed, but we will only have achieved something once we qualify for the finals."

"Everything in life starts with faith. Without faith we wouldn't have beaten Austria. The game in Spain depends on our results beforehand, and on Spain's results. If we go into the game with something to play for, anything is possible," he added.

Art by the linear foot

By JORDAN MAX

Last Laugh

Warning: This column is meant to be read only by parents of school-aged children. By the time you, dear parent, are reading this column, another school year will be over. No doubt you're more relieved than your kids are.

Around the Max household, the end of the school year also provides a unique opportunity to finally deal with the year's mountain of original artwork and assignments brought home by our children. Judging by the volume, you might easily think that the kids were being paid by the linear foot of material produced. The looming question, is just what exactly does one do with all this stuff?

Each year, our children manage to create yet another unique challah cover, candelabra, honey jar, chanukiah, havdalah set, matzah cover, seder plate, mezuzah, kiddush cup, not to mention parshah-related illustrations, etc. Naturally, each one is admired for its intrinsic artistic value and all the hard work that went into its creation. And naturally, like all artists, they expect that the object will be put to good use.

Sensitive egos being what they are, the younger child wants to feel that his version is just as special as the one done last year by his older brother. During the school year, this leads to frequent competition over whose kiddush cup gets used on Shabbat, whose havdalah set, etc.

Sure, you can rotate them, you can give them to bubbies and zaydes, aunts, uncles, the mailman, even total strangers. Still, the supply exceeds the demand as you eventually run out of lucky recipients, and so we end up holding onto most of these beloved tchatchkes.

As if that wasn't enough, there's all the paper, the assignments, the mini-books of first numbers, letters, animals, science projects, spelling, writing, you name it, all lovingly prepared and presented weekly for parental admiration. Oy, such nachas! A virtual smorgasbord of learning, plastered on every available square inch of wall and fridge space, and crammed into every possible nook and cranny, shelf and drawer throughout the house. I even had to move my antique prime minister-shaped lint collection (a complete set!) to make room.

Now, my anecdotal research indicates that most couples are usually composed of pack rats and thrower-outers (can't think of a more scientific name). This tension gets heightened when it comes to our children's prolific output. Who knows, maybe the stick figures drawings that Bubbie says are just like Chagall would be worth millions if sold as modern art (It's hard to tell the difference, anyway.)

Or, maybe that math or science assignment is worth submitting in about 10 years' time, along with their medical/law school application, clearly demonstrating their early aptitude or abstract conceptual prowess.

So every July, in our effort to deal with The Mountain, as I affectionately call it, we have our annual discussion about what gets saved for posterity, and what gets euphemistically known as "lost."

It's usually a pretty ugly contest, which leaves both the pack rat and the thrower-outer with only two real choices. Sure, you can regain some living and storage space at the cost of parental guilt on throwing out your children's creations (paid for by hard-earned tuition). Or, you can keep absolutely everything, just because, well, you never know when you'll want to revisit it in 30 years' time when the kids have (hopefully) moved away and you want to take a trip down Nostalgia Boulevard. But to do this, you have to rent out a warehouse to store it all. And if you keep some and toss some, how do you know you haven't accidentally thrown out their future doctoral thesis or billion-dollar invention idea? So this year we've compromised, deciding to alternate years; this year is the keep-it-all, next year it's throw-it-all-out. Unless, of course, there's something that's really unique...

About Teens

Dear Karilani:

I'm going to sleepover camp for the first time this year. For the past couple of years I've gone to day camp, but this summer I thought I wanted to change and asked to go away. But now, as the summer is approaching, I'm starting to get really scared. I've heard a lot of stories, and camp sounds like a lot of fun, but I'm still nervous about being in a foreign atmosphere surrounded by people I don't know. I'm going with one of my best friends from school, but he has been going there for the past four summers, and he already has many friends I don't know. I'm worried that as soon as we step off the bus, he will forget about me and become absorbed in his camp life.

Scared to sleep over

Dear Scared to sleep over,

It is totally normal for you to feel apprehensive about going to sleepover camp for the first time. The issues that you are worrying about have the potential to cause problems; however, it is important for you to not obsess about the "what ifs" and focus on the wonderful things summer holds for you.

Think of the different stories that you have heard about sleepover camp. Camp is such a unique and wonderful place. It offers so many opportunities that you don't necessarily have at a regular day camp.

It sounds as though your biggest fear is that your best friend will not spend time with you at camp and he will be too focused on his camp friends. Here are some things you must keep in mind.

You and your friend agreed to go to camp together, so he is also looking forward to sharing his summer life with you. Seeing as you called him your best friend, we are assuming that you share a unique and special relationship. When two people are so close, it is not natural for one to dump the other in a new situation. You should have confidence in the relationship you share with your friend, for a true friend would not leave his best friend feeling sad and alone.

Something else you must remember, is that you will have the opportunity to make friends of your own. Once you have adjusted to camp life, you may find that you will have your own group of friends, and in that case you won't have to rely on your best friend as much. Even if friends you become close with are not close with your best friend, it is okay. Remember, you do always have your best friend there for additional support.

Have a great time at camp. Don't worry about problems that may possibly develop. Rather, think about the great experiences and memories you will have to cherish.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 11 in Toronto.

Barak forges coalition

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak forged a coalition government of 75 Knesset members last week. He was to officially present it to the Knesset this week on Tuesday, three days before the deadline for doing so expires.

As required under law, Barak sent a letter to the acting speaker of the Knesset, former prime minister Shimon Peres, informing him that he had formed his government, which he would present this week, according to Barak spokesperson Merav Parsi Tzadok.

75 members

Barak intends to expand the size of the cabinet from 18 to 24 ministers in the coming weeks.

He sent the letter to Peres hours after reaching agreement with the Shas party.

As part of that agreement, Shas is to receive authority over four ministries: Health, Infrastructure, Labor and Religious Affairs.

Shas, which increased its Knesset representation to 17 seats from 10 in the outgoing legislature, takes a relatively dovish stance on ceding land for peace.

Along with Shas, Barak has signed agreements with Yisrael b'Aliyah, Meretz, the National Religious Party (NRP), the United Torah Judaism (UTJ) bloc, the Centre party and One Nation.

With UTJ, Shas and the NRP in the coalition, it appears unlikely that the Knesset will enact legislation instituting pluralism in the administration of marriage and divorce.

Though Barak had initially said he hoped to form a government that also includes the Likud party, coalition talks with acting Likud leader Ariel Sharon broke down.

The Likud had sought an equal voice in deciding policy, particularly on the political process.

Negotiating teams began discussing a coalition package for Shas after it met Barak's key demands to oust its corruption-tainted leader, Aryeh Deri, and forgo its demand for control of the interior ministry.

Meretz, a champion of secular rights, had initially said it would refuse to participate in a government with Shas, citing Deri's bribery and fraud conviction.

But Shas' willingness to give up control of the Interior Ministry, which it has held for 15 years, persuaded Meretz to remain in Barak's coalition.

In addition to the ministries going to Shas, the following portfolios have been parceled out :

Son missing 17 years

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although his anguish runs deep, Yona Baumel shows a father's pain for a lost son only briefly during a one-hour interview. Most of the time, he's all business, pulling no punches in discussing the diplomatic duplicity and political lassitude that have stymied efforts to free his son from captivity in Lebanon.

But asked to describe how he and his wife Miriam, are coping knowing that their son, Zachary, an IDF soldier, has been missing in action (MiA) for 17 of his 39 years, his cool demeanor gives way as he tries to fight back bitter emotion.

"We have a lot of good friends," he explains, struggling to maintain his composure. "As we have gotten weaker, they have undertaken part of the burden." He then quickly switches topics to focus on the process of finding his son.

Today, the Baumels enjoy the benefits of a network of contacts around the world, who are opening all sorts of doors for them in their quest to free Zachary. According to the best information Yona has received, Zachary, who was born in the United States, and two other Israeli MiAs are being held in relatively good conditions by Lebanese "moderates, not Hezbollah," near the Syrian border. They are being held as negotiating "assets" pending a final deal between Israel and Syria on the Golan Heights, he believes.

Yona Baumel

Despite Syrian claims of ignorance as to his fate, Baumel believes his son will be "found," if and when a deal with Israel is close.

While serving in the Israeli army, Zachary, along with Yehuda Katz and Zvi Feldman, were captured following a tank battle with Syrian and Palestinian forces at Sultan Ya'akub in Lebanon. Navigator Ron Arad, is the fourth Israeli MiA. Since their capture, the MiAs have been traded among Palestinian and Lebanese factions like so much merchandise, Baumel said.

To effect their return, the Baumels have taken their cause outside regular government channels, which have proven of limited

TORONTO — UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has started an online petition to protest Iran's arrest of 13 Jews charged with spying. Visitors to the site may sign their name and e-mail it to the Iranian Embassy in Ottawa. The site is at www.feduja.org/temp/iran/president.stm.

Protest For Iranian Jews

OTTAWA — Over 100 people attended a recent protest outside the Iranian Embassy here in support of the 13 Jews arrested in Iran. Prayers were recited, and five local rabbis were in attendance. As well, member of Parliament David Pratt delivered a message of support from the federal government.

Israeli Mayors Visit

CALGARY — Calgary Mayor Al Duerr welcomed five Israeli mayors on a cross-Canada tour of Canadian cities to strengthen relations with Diaspora communities. Duerr met with the leaders of the northern Galilee Panhandle, comprising Mevo'ot Hahermon, Yesod Hamaala, Metulla, Kiryat Shmonah and the Upper Galilee Regional Council. A few days later, the five officials met with Vancouver Mayor Philip Owen.

ISRAEL

Grave May Be Opened

JERUSALEM — Israel's High Court of Justice has ruled that the grave of a soldier killed along with 11 other soldiers in a raid in Lebanon more than two years ago should be opened in order to conduct DNA testing to identify the remains. The Israeli army buried the remains, returned to Israel along with those of two other soldiers received in a prisoner swap with Hezbollah, without the family's knowledge.

JNF Fights Drought

JERUSALEM — The Jewish National Fund says it is helping the government fight the worst drought in Israel's history. The organization notes that water levels in Lake Kinneret, which supplies 35 percent of the country's potable water, is one to two inches from the danger level.

Undersea Wreck Found

JERUSALEM — Undersea explorers off Israel's coast have found what they described as the oldest known deep-water wrecks. The explorers, who found a pair of Phoenician cargo ships they said were more than 2,500 years old, used the same underwater tracking equipment that was used to locate the Titanic.

WORLD

Meeting Disappoints

WASHINGTON — Some of the 20 U.S. Jewish leaders who met with Egypt's president late last month said they were disappointed with Hosni Mubarak's reluctance to take a firm stand on a number of issues raised. Topics included the 13 Iranian Jews accused of espionage, anti-Semitism in Egypt and a meeting of parties to the Geneva Convention to discuss Israeli settlements. Abraham Foxman of the Anti-Defamation League, described the meeting as "very unsatisfying."

Yeltsin Criticizes Minister

MOSCOW — Russian President Boris Yeltsin criticized his justice minister for not unearthing evidence that the Communist party broke the law when some of its top officials launched anti-Semitic attacks last year on the nation's Jewish community. According to Russia's Interfax news agency, Yeltsin said he had uncovered several legal violations by the communists, adding that he was upset the minister had not filed charges against the party.

Israeli Envoy Resigns

RIGA — Israel's ambassador to the Baltic countries has resigned after accusing Lithuania of a poor record in prosecuting suspected Nazi war criminals. Oded Ben Hur, who serves as Israel's envoy to Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia, announced he would quit in a few weeks. Earlier, Ben Hur said the Baltic nations, particularly Lithuania, would find it difficult to integrate into Europe if they fail to acknowledge their roles in the Holocaust.

No Damage in Fire

VENICE — Several families were evacuated after a fire broke out last month in Venice's Jewish district, called the New Ghetto. A spokesperson for the Jewish community said no communal property was damaged. The ghetto, the heart of the city's historic Jewish quarter, is the site of a museum, community offices and several centuries-old synagogues.

Kosovo Jewish Leader Evacuated

PRISTINA — International Jewish representatives last week entered Kosovo for the first time since the NATO air war against Yugoslavia began, and evacuated the leader of Pristina's Jewish community and his family.

Chedar Prlincevic, 61, his wife and his 81-year-old mother were brought to the Macedonian capital of Skopje by Viktor Mizrachi, president of the 186-member Jewish community of Macedonia.

Prlincevic and his family were reported to be in good health and spirits, but exhausted from the stress of the previous few months.

In late June, armed men visited their home in Pristina and ordered them to leave town. Prlincevic said the men were not members of the Kosovo Liberation Army, but appeared to be members of a rogue paramilitary group acting on their own.

He described the situation in Pristina as tense and unsettled.

Mizrachi came to Kosovo along with Eli Eliezri, the officer for special projects of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, the first time outside Jewish organizations have entered the province since NATO's bombing began in March.

Cemetery bars burial of Christian minister

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Vaad Harabonim forbade the burial at Pardes Shalom cemetery of a Jew who had become an ordained Christian minister.

Last week's decision by the Vaad Harabonim, the council of Orthodox rabbis, was endorsed by Rabbi Michael Stroh, the immediate past president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, which represents Conservative and Reform rabbis.

"It was a last minute decision because until then we had no information about it," said Rabbi Moshe Stern, head of the Vaad Harabonim.

The bylaws of Pardes Shalom prevent the burial of a non-Jew, said Keith Landy, Ontario Region president of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC). The CJC spoke on behalf of Pardes Shalom on this matter.

Landy said on the morning of the funeral service, Bernie Farber, the region's executive director, got a call from a reporter of a Christian publication advising him of the background of the case.

Leslie Jacobs, 48, termed it a "scandal" that his father, Malvern Jacobs, 71, was not permitted burial in Pardes Shalom

Although the family decided against a court injunction to force their father to be buried in Pardes Shalom, Jacobs said they will now proceed with civil action.

The cortege had wound its way north from Steeles Memorial Chapel only to find the cemetery's gates locked.

The mourners and the hearse were left outside the gates of the cemetery on Dufferin Street, north of Maple, in Vaughan, for two hours.

Later the body was returned to Steeles chapel, where a second service was held the next day, followed by a burial at York Region Cemetery on Beecroft Avenue.

Both services were conducted by Rabbi Aaron Zimmerman of Beth Meyer Synagogue who was described as a "childhood friend."

One of the unanswered questions is how the family purchased a plot in Pardes Shalom for Jacobs and whether there was disclosure of his messianic activities, said Landy.

The decision to bar Jacobs' burial in Pardes Shalom was based on his acceptance of Jesus as his messiah and his proselytizing activities which targeted Jews for conversion to Christianity, Rabbi Stern said.

"On the surface it appears harsh and cruel, but we had no way of knowing beforehand what was taking place.

"There should have been some checking on his background before the service. There may be others buried in Pardes Shalom who should not be there, but if we don't know, we can't ask."

Landy said Jacobs' decision to accept Jesus as the Messiah "clearly left him outside the Jewish community."

He said Jacobs was not only active in proselytizing among Jews, but he was also a deacon at a Christian congregation, and for a time, a minister at a Japanese pastoral church.

In a press release, the CJC, which said it "regretted" the incident at the cemetery gates, noted that Jacobs was dean of the department of Jewish studies at Canada Christian College. The program was removed from the curriculum as a result of complaints from the Jewish community.

Congress backs conflict mediation

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Ontario region executive of Canadian Jewish Congress recently voted to offer a mediation approach to settling arguments between Jews who don't want their difficulties made public.

Supporting the move into a new area for Congress, regional chair Keith Landy said the mediation process would be self-financing and not profit-making, and applicants would be asked to pay the administration costs.

"It's all a voluntary process. We're not out to supplant anyone," Landy said.

"We were surprised at how responsive the Vaad Harabonim were," said executive member Sharon Wolfe, who presented the motion. "Rabbi Philip Scheim, president of

There is a world of difference between "life goes on" and "life is good."

When people age, or become ill, or suffer a trauma, they don't suddenly give up who they are to take on a new identity called 'patient' or 'client'. They remain themselves, with deeply rooted values, traditions, and needs.

That's why at circle of care, we pay attention to what makes each person unique. Our home care options take into account lifestyle, family and community. We are sensitive to and respect each person's religion, culture, language, and background.

Israeli election studied

Last month, on behalf of The Canadian Jewish News, I attended the annual conference of the American Jewish Press Association (AJPA). This year's conference was held in Philadelphia, a city whose downtown is a juxtaposition between the habitual hallmarks of modern urban life – office workers surging along crowded sidewalks to and from their places in the eight-hour cadence of their office jobs – and the historic hallmarks of the country's founding constitution.

It was an opportunity for representatives from the diverse body of weekly and monthly Jewish newspapers and magazines to meet to exchange ideas and to discuss issues of mutual concern.

Over the years, of course, the annual contacts with colleagues from other communities have evolved into friendships, and these friendships serve as a support system, a helpful network of contacts for editors and reporters who must contend with similar journalistic problems and issues during the course of their daily work.

The conference planners arranged an intense three-day program of educational and working sessions, bringing together scholars and experts in fields that are relevant and important to the mandate of the Jewish media.

The educational sessions included panel discussions on the recent Israeli elections; what Jewish texts say about contemporary issues in Jewish journalism; whether the North American Jewish press is fair in its coverage of the Orthodox community; and a revisiting of the issues arising from the recent European restitution efforts for property stolen from Jews during World War II.

In light of the fact that Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak, last week, finally announced the formation of his governing coalition, I shall share some of the highlights from the session on the Israeli election.

The panelists in the discussion were: Nitzan Horowitz, political analyst with Ha'aretz, Daniel Pipes, professor in Middle East studies at the University of Pennsylvania, and Mark Regev, the spokesman at the Israeli Embassy in

Ehud Barak

Washington.

Each shed different light on the subject; each had a unique perspective. Horowitz, the veteran Israeli journalist was emotional and impassioned. Pipes, the distinguished academic, was analytic and dispassionate. Regev, constrained by the responsibilities of his diplomatic office, spoke with circumspect politesse.

It was a treat listening to them.

Horowitz emphasized the point that domestic, rather than foreign, issues were the dominant theme during the election campaign. Barak was indeed elected to make peace with the Arabs, Horowitz stated. But he quickly added that Barak was also elected to make peace "within Israel."

The key, recurring campaign slogan among centre-left parties and among the political commentators was chevrah mitukenet, loosely translated to incorporate concepts of a civil, just and proper society.

"Expectations on Barak are very high. If he neglects the domestic issues for foreign policy, he will make a big mistake." According to Horowitz, between 70 and 80 percent of Israelis are in favor of proceeding with the peace process. The more pressing, more urgent task facing Barak was to address the "many social problems."

Pipes turned his attention to foreign policy. In his opinion, there is an increasing disparity between Israeli and Arab attitudes on peace.

Among Israelis, there is broad consensus (100 of 120 Knesset members) to try to resolve the conflict with the Palestinians. "Israelis have decided to get on with it," Pipes said, "as a function of their active political system, their dynamic economy and their strong military machine."

Among Arabs however, the discussion is still being conducted in terms of "victory."

"Victory, not peace," Pipes observed, "appears to be their goal."

He expressed concern that the asymmetry between the Israeli desire for a resolution of the conflict and the Arab desire for a victory from the conflict was a looming problem.

Since most of the people who voted for Barak as prime minister (56 percent of the votes cast) in fact, voted for parties other than Barak's party (26 seats), Regev suggested that Barak would avoid the mistake made by the Rabin/Peres government of trying to implement far-reaching, wholesale policy changes on the basis only of a narrow coalition. "Therefore," Regev continued, "Barak will want a coalition with at least a high-60's number of seats."

Last week, Barak forged a coalition of 74 members. This week he presented it to the Knesset.

Teacher reprimanded for taking day off to prepare for Passover

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — A Jewish teacher has ended the school year with a black mark on her record for having taken a day off to prepare for Passover.

Lisa Wolfman, a Grade 8 teacher at German Mills Public School in Thornhill, admits she defied her boss, who refused to give her erev Passover off to help her aging mother and mother-in-law prepare for large seders. But she feels that an official reprimand that has been entered into her file is unfair.

Wolfman, 41, says she had to take the day off because preparing for the two seders involved so much work. She points out that teachers at Jewish day schools, especially female ones, either worked a half-day on March 31, or were given the day off entirely.

Wolfman and her union launched a grievance against the school board, saying the reprimand is unjust and seriously impedes her chances for advancement.

In March, Wolfman informed her principal in writing that she needed to take erev Passover, March 31, off to prepare for two seders, one at her mother's house for 33 people, and the other at her mother-in-law's for 15 people.

She explained the importance of the seder, and how much work was involved in the changing of dishes and cooking utensils, and in preparing.

Wolfman, who has taught for 18 years, volunteered to lose a day's pay.

She was told she could not take the day off, as it was not a religious holiday. But she took it off anyway, expecting to lose a day's salary.

On her return to school, she was handed a written reprimand.

"I expected to lose a day's pay, but I didn't expect [the reprimand]," she told The CJN. "But there was no way I could not take the day off."

Wolfman launched her grievance, and in a written presentation to the board, cited sources explaining that Passover begins at sundown and that preparing a seder means a lot of work. She also received letters of support from two Toronto rabbis.

In mid-May, a panel consisting of her principal, two board superintendents and her union representative upheld the reprimand as justified. The reprimand will stay in her file for three years.

The next hearing on the matter will take place in September.

Wolfman said she was simply trying to be honest.

"I could have called in sick. I could have lied. But that would go against what I teach." She said five other female Jewish teachers at her school phoned in sick that day.

Teachers are permitted five days off a year to observe religious festivals, but the board was told by Canadian Jewish Congress that the day of erev Passover is not a holy day.

Wolfman believes this is a gender issue, as it is generally women who prepare the Passover seder.

She concedes her employer was acting within prescribed guidelines, but could have easily complied with her request, and just docked her a day's pay. She said she never had a problem with Passover in previous years.

Chris Collins, the board's superintendent of schools, who had been involved in Wolfman's case, said she could only speak about general policy.

She said allowing teachers to take off any day they want is "too disruptive."

Days off above and beyond those allowed for religious observance are permitted "very rarely...once in a lifetime. We have to be consistent and fair. If you allow it for one person, you have to allow it for all."

She stressed that Canadian Jewish Congress informed the board that erev Passover is not a holiday, and, while not referring to Wolfman specifically, remarked that "insubordination is very serious."

JRCC provides support, guidance for Russian Jews

By MILA KLETSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Everybody in the Russian Jewish community knows where to go when they want their needs to be met with care. This well-known place is the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC).

Guest Voice

Russian Jews can usually find support and guidance at the JRCC when they first arrive in Toronto or later, when they are dealing with routine problems.

The most powerful arms of the centre are the educational institutes, which include the Centre for Judaic Studies (CJS). The institute provides the community, both Russian and English-speaking, with an extensive educational program for the whole year.

The new summer semester will deliver various topics on Jewish life, such as religion, philosophy, history and arts. Some aspects of healthy living will also be explored.

Rabbi Levi Jacobson, the director of the CJS, willingly shares his vision of the development of the centre. His hope is to help people better understand important issues, he says.

He deals with what it means to be a Jew, why Jews have been prosecuted for centuries, and how to lead a Jewish life.

People coming here from the former Soviet Union (FSU) are not usually aware of what Judaism is about, or how to pray, or even what to read. Many do not have any awareness about Judaism or Jewish values. Back in the FSU they learned to survive without it.

They long to learn more about Judaism, their own history and traditions as well as about Jews from other countries. In the centre, almost everyone finds something exciting and important to learn about.

The JRCC and CJS thought about everyone who might want to come to study. They offer courses of all types in all fields, delivered by rabbis, professors of Judaic studies and Russian scientists.

While the centre offers courses on many aspects of Jewish life, the intent is not to foist religious values on anybody.

As Rabbi Jacobson points out, "We just provide people with the information. They are free to make their own decisions on what they have learned."

Many people from the Russian Jewish community have a solid scientific background. They also have their own deeply rooted opinions on many aspect of the Torah.

Rabbi Jacobson's experience and educational background help him to discuss many topics with such people. Other participants who make the seminars attractive for those with scientific backgrounds include Prof. Alexander Lakshin, a PhD from New York, and Dr. Mark Rothman.

Is the Torah relevant to modern-day man? This is a topic which is explored by the JRCC executive director, Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, in an effort to challenge people to think in new ways.

This semester's seminar on healthy homes aims at keeping bodies healthy and creating an appropriate environment for Jewish souls.

A surprising outcome at the CJS, is accidental job placements. Several times during the course of a seminar conducted by Rabbi Jacobson, people have shared their life plans. It so happened that Rabbi Jacobson was in a position to give them a hand, and he directed them to people who could provide real assistance.

The director of the CJS envisions the centre as a Jewish university, where immigrants can find educational programs, employment information, and help to develop their spiritual life in terms of real Jewish values.

Reservist sounds alarm over possible attacks on settlements

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

TORONTO — Jewish settlements in the West Bank may face an attack by Arabs that could wipe them out, according to an Israel Defence Force (IDF) reservist.

Mordechai Sones, 30, recently spoke at B'nai Torah Congregation, where he discussed the problems faced by the yishuvim (settlements) in the Yehuda and Shomron areas.

Citing facts taken from his own report published earlier by the Toronto Zionist Council, Sones described the Palestinian Authority's (PA) military threat to the West Bank settlements, and said the response of Benjamin Netanyahu's government was disappointing.

When yishuvim residents heard nighttime gunfire, they were told by the IDF that these were Arab "weddings," said Sones. However, a visiting military adviser travelling through the region analyzed the pattern of firing and concluded that the brief, intense bursts of shooting normally took place during assault training.

"The yishuvim are not psychologically prepared for what might happen," said Sones, an Orthodox Jew who lives in the settlement of Nachlieland and works as a tour guide.

An Arab force would crush the poorly equipped Jewish settlers, he said. The PA has 60,000 weapons of better quality than those owned by the settlers.

"We have old World War II guns," said Sones. "Few people know how to use them and they are prone to jamming and explosion. We've been promised better guns, but nothing has happened."

He expressed dissatisfaction that the IDF provides most yishuvim with only 20 minutes worth of ammunition, because, he said, it becomes impossible to respond to Arab fire, and this can enable Arab commandos to overrun the defensive perimeters.

Also, the 180,000 settlers don't stand a chance against armored PA vehicles like the BRDM-2, said Sones. This fully armored tank with two machines guns and a steel hull can easily smash through a yishuv gate. Over 50 tanks are stationed in the West Bank and Gaza.

"We are left vulnerable," he said, "and no one can stop the Arabs if they decide to attack us."

The IDF has held back information, he claimed. In a yishuv near Shechem, an IDF official admitted under intense questioning at a town meeting that a 300-man PA unit was nearby.

Sones said his report also highlights his worry that the yishuvim may not act together.

"The IDF's recurrent attempts to convince some yishuvim to be less concerned because the first strike threat is directed against other yishuvim could represent an attempt to plant false hopes among some of them," he said.

"We must speak in one voice and draw the line."

People assume officials will take care of it, he said. His current goal is to bring information to the yishuvim.

Sones, who was born in Boston, joined a youth organization on behalf of the Republican party at the age of 15. He was part of the team that assisted with the election of Ronald Reagan as president and George Bush as his vice-president.

He became a soldier in a mobile platoon in Israel, where he discovered how inadequate it was, he said, because it had meagre equipment, ineffective units and soldiers with poor training.

"We in the council of Jewish communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza are meant to be strong and prepared," said Sones. But, he added, the yishuvim must be mentally prepared before beginning physical training.

To uncover more facts about PA preparations for war, Sones estimates $45,000 is needed.

The Internet is a great way to spread information, said Sones, but only 20,000 West Bank residents are on line. It will take approximately 20 weeks to compile their e-mail addresses, he noted.

If the 144 yishuvim in the West Bank are to be saved, Sones said, the residents must be heard.

"History has taught us that nothing can be gained by remaining silent."

National Academy of Science honors Toronto doctor

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

TORONTO — A Toronto doctor has received one of the greatest honors in the medical world, an induction into the National Academy of Sciences (NAS) in Washington.

"Except for the Nobel Prize, this is the most prestigious award for scientists," says the honoree, Dr. Louis Siminovitch, director of research at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute at Mount Sinai Hospital.

Dr. Louis Siminovitch

Montreal-born Siminovitch, 79, has acquired over 20 honors and awards during his 55 years as a geneticist.

His work has involved mainly the application and examination of somatic cell structure, the study of mammalian cells, the cells found in the human body.

He has also studied the spread of disease in genes. Everything is controlled through genes, he says. Disease occurs when something goes wrong in the genes. For example, cystic fibrosis is caused by a "mistake" in a single gene, he notes.

'It keeps my brain working'

Siminovitch received his PhD in chemistry from McGill University in 1944. He has since worked for the National Research Council of Canada, the subdivision of microbiology at the Ontario Cancer Institute, and the Hospital for Sick Children (as a geneticist-in-chief).

He stopped doing research in 1985 because he found it to be a "young man's game," he says. However, he is still active on 17 advisory boards, including those of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, the University of Southern California, the Canadian Institute of Academic Medicine and the Montreal Neurological Institute. He is also a professor at the University of Toronto.

"I like what I do," Siminovitch says. "It's like a hobby, it keeps my brain working."

He considers genetic research essential to modern science.

Siminovitch says scientists can now identify women who have a specific gene that increases the chance of their developing breast cancer, and can then determine if an examination is needed every six months or every two years.

This type of research "can start preventing disease," notes Siminovitch.

The NAS, a non-profit organization established in 1863, advises the U.S. government on medical issues. Siminovitch says that only five Canadians in the medical field have been recognized by the NAS, which has some 4,000 members.

Siminovitch sees Toronto's strong medical community as internationally competitive in cancer research. "Many awards from the National Cancer Institute have been given to people in Toronto."

The geneticist has also lectured in synagogues and is a member of Temple Sinai.

Siminovitch espouses strong humanist values. "It is important to be concerned for our fellow human beings."

As technology and science work together to increase advancements in the medical field, Siminovitch says he is excited about the future of genetics.

Truth was absent

Because death is so searingly painful a confrontation with the ultimate question of human existence, every religion attaches special sanctity to the rites of bereavement. In the case of Judaism, there are precise religious procedures surrounding death, interment and mourning.

In keeping with Judaism's heightened attentiveness to the needs of the mourners, the procedures are designed to confer final dignity upon the deceased and, at the same time, a system of communal comfort upon the grieving family. The ancient rabbis decreed it a high obligation to accompany a deceased person to his or her final resting place. Indeed, they referred to this obligation as chesed shel emet, loving kindness of truth, no doubt as a reminder to us all of the common, final inescapability of our fates.

Truth, however, seemed sorely and sorrowfully absent last week among the leaders of the group that attempted to bury Malvern Jacobs at the Pardes Shalom Cemetery in Vaughan near Toronto.

Jacobs was born a Jew. But some 40 years ago, he converted to Christianity and was ordained a minister, eventually becoming a deacon in the Anglican Church. For a time, he was also the dean of the Canada Christian College in Toronto. More than 25 years ago, according to one newspaper, Jacobs started the largest Christian missionary congregation in North York. The core tenet of Jacobs' religious belief, and the central feature of his religious behavior, it would be fair to say, was proselytizing among other Jews to have them accept Christianity. No reasonable person therefore, could quarrel with the statement by Keith Landy, president of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region, that Jacobs, during his life, "had placed himself outside the Jewish community."

When the appropriate Jewish religious authorities were made aware of the fact that the body of Malvern Jacobs was being carried to a Jewish cemetery for interment, they had but sparse few moments to decide upon the acceptability under Jewish law of burying a Christian missionary in a Jewish cemetery.

We commend Rabbi Moshe Stern, the chair of Toronto's Vaad Harabonim for deciding that Jewish law could not sanction Jacobs' burial in a Jewish cemetery. We commend Rabbi Michael Stroh, on behalf of the Toronto Board of Rabbis for supporting Rabbi Stern.

There was no alternative in the circumstances but to bar the body from being buried in the cemetery. Thus the gates were locked.

What ensued was an emotional melee of accusation and recrimination at the very gates of the cemetery, directed against Toronto's Jewish authorities.

The CJC explained the reasons for the Jewish community's decision to a hungrily inquiring print and electronic media, conveniently apprised of the situation moments after it occurred.

In one of the network newscasts that evening, the spokesperson for the Jacobs family was Jeffery Forman. He was identified on the newscast as "Rabbi" Jeffery Forman. But, of course, he is not a rabbi. He is, rather, the minister at the Christian missionary City of David in Thornhill. Regrettably, the reporter made no attempt to inform the television viewers of Forman's rabbinic "credentials."

This mischaracterization typified the entire incident.

The Jewish community was cast in a harsh, negative light for ostensibly refusing to bury one of its own. But every fair-minded, sentient Canadian can understand and would agree that it is the right of every faith community, including the Jewish faith, to determine its own religious doctrine on matters of burial and of religious identity. One would think the missionary group of which Jacobs was a member for the last 40 years of his life and who, it appears, was in charge of the funeral arrangements, would have understood this as well.

The incident at the gates of Pardes Shalom last week was indeed regrettable. But it was caused by the missionaries who tried to bury an ordained Christian minister in a Jewish cemetery, and not by the decision of Toronto's rabbinate.

Suggests hidden agenda in NATO bombing

In the Kosovo situation, the issue is one of repatriation. Albania should repatriate those Albanian Muslims who are in Kosovo illegally. What is being ignored, is that during World War II, with the help of Hitler's Nazi army and their Croatian Nazi allies, the Muslim Albanians moved into the Serbian province of Kosovo, which had a Serbian majority, threw the Serbs out of their homes and massacred many of them. The Muslim Albanians and the Nazi forces, who together were fighting to dominate Yugoslavia, launched a holocaust against the Serbs, and massacred two million of them. There is no comparison between the two million Serbs who were massacred by the Muslim Albanians and the German and Croatian Nazis, and the 20,000 Albanians killed by the Serbs in Kosovo. Can any people with any pride not try to retaliate against such diabolical and dastardly deeds?

What the Serbs did to the ethnic Albanians in Kosovo pales into insignificance when compared to the far, far greater atrocities committed against the Kurds, the southern Christian Sudanese by the Muslim Sudanese government of the north, the Tibetans, and Tutsis in Rwanda.

The world has been misled by the misinformation of President Bill Clinton, the U.S. State Department, NATO and much of the media, which obligingly perform the State Department's bidding. Repeat a big lie often enough until it is believed.

It is imperative that Clinton, the U.S. State Department and their NATO stooges reveal their hidden agenda (their true motive).

Judy Feld Carr rescued Syrian Jews

Surely, there is another word that could be substituted for "gushed" referring to Judy Feld Carr's praise for her husband's support. (CJN, June 3)

I looked up the word in the dictionary, and it confirms my first impression that she was speaking extravagantly, emotionally or effusively. Until I reached that word, I believed that this article was complimentary to the remarkable work Feld Carr had achieved in Syria. It should have been complimentary. She deserves a lot of praise. Gush is out. Save gush for a geyser.

Many thanks for an otherwise extremely satisfying newspaper.

Publishing book on mother-child bond

My mother died when I was six, leaving me with deep regrets and empty places. I wish I had a clear recollection of her. It hurts that I cannot remember the sound of her voice, the shape of her hands, the ring of her laugh, the strength of her arms.

I am compiling an anthology of combined voices trying to make sense of the mystery of the mother-child bond. I hope to publish this collection, which will be a gift to me and to those who wonder in their quietest moments, "What is it like to have a mother?"

Two faces of society: opera and beggars

Recently I attended a TSO concert on a very pleasant Saturday evening. At the front doors of Roy Thomson Hall stood a beggar with a sign around his neck. It read, "I am homeless. Can you spare some change?" Symbolism? He looked dirty and wore soiled, torn clothes.

In this mornings paper I read: "Curtain rises on city's opera house design, $130 million project."

If the house is built, who will attend the operas? Beggars?

Looking for cousins of writer Rachel Korn

I am trying to locate cousins of mine who emigrated from Poland to Montreal or Toronto around 1948-51. The mother, Rachel Haring Korn (1898-1982) wrote Jewish poetry, some of which was translated into English.

She wrote in Polish until 1918. She had a daughter, Rena Korn, who would be in her 70s. Her married name is Kupershmidt, Kupersmith or Coopersmith. Rena had two sons; one or both are doctors.

Jewish Agency outlines new vision

By JULIA GOLDMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Just as the Jewish Agency for Israel was outlining a new vision for its future, Israeli legislators were offering motions in the Knesset questioning whether the agency should have a future at all.

The Jewish Agency's annual assembly closed on June 23, having ratified in principle a strategic plan that broadens its traditional mission of aliyah, rescue, absorption and Zionist education to include broader engagement in Jewish identity, Jewish unity and "strengthening the State of Israel as the state for all Jews."

But the following day, Knesset members Reuven Rivlin of Likud and Yossi Beilin of One Israel introduced separate motions in the Knesset that envision vastly different relationships between the Diaspora and Israel.

According to a report in the Israeli daily Ha'aretz, Beilin called for the agency's total dissolution, to be replaced by a "parliament of the Jewish people."

Rivlin, on the other hand, suggested that the agency's areas of activity be scaled back to cover only Jewish education in the Diaspora and immigration from countries where Israel's direct involvement would have precarious political consequences.

The Jewish Agency, traditionally the main recipient of North American Jewish dollars for Israel, has periodically had to justify its existence over its 70 years. In those cases, as now, critics have charged that it is a bloated bureaucracy whose work could be done more efficiently by the Israeli government itself.

But advocates stress the agency's critical role in having patriated millions of olim to Israel, and in serving as a link between Israel and the rest of the Jewish world.

The agency was founded in 1929 by Chaim Weizmann – then president of the World Zionist Organization (WZO), and later, Israel's first president – as a partnership between the WZO and Diaspora Jews who wanted to take part in the establishment of the State of Israel.

Since then, the Jewish Agency has become a quasi-governmental body responsible primarily for bringing new immigrants to Israel and resettling them.

Most of the agency's funding has come from the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) and local Jewish federations in North America, and from Keren Hayesod in other countries.

Now that relationship is changing, too.

This year, UJA and the Council of Jewish Federations merged with the United Israel Appeal (UIA) to create the United Jewish Communities (UJC). Funding for Israel and global Jewish causes will be determined by the newly formed Overseas Needs Assessment and Distributions (ONAD) Committee of the UJC.

Its 25 members will include representatives from federations, and for the first time, three members each from the Jewish Agency and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

While this arrangement gives the Jewish Agency a direct voice in funding allocations, it will also force the agency to defend all of its funding needs at a time when federations are demanding greater control over how collective moneys are spent.

David Goldstein, president of UIA Federations Canada, recently took part in a Jewish Agency/Keren Hayesod relief flight to Macedonia to aid refugees from Kosovo. The Jewish Agency, thus far, has sent 10 planeloads of relief supplies to Albania and Macedonia. Jewish communities in North America and Israel have raised more than $4 million for refugee relief in Kosovo. [M. Finkelstein photo]

Moreover, the contract between UIA and the Jewish Agency, which designates the agency as the exclusive recipient of Jewish communal philanthropy in Israel, has been extended only until December 2000.

In May, Ami Uliel, deputy chair of the Praesidium of the Zionist Council in Israel, called for the Jewish Agency to disband.

He suggested instead, the creation of an independent, worldwide Zionist organization with its own sources of funding.

But defenders of the Jewish Agency strongly dispute the proposals of Uliel and the Knesset members.

"If the remarks made about the irrelevance of the Jewish Agency come from the mouths of imbeciles or cynics, they are not worthy of a response," said Sallai Meridor, the new chair of the Jewish Agency and WZO.

"If they come from the mouths of those who do not know how to ask, then we have to explain to them about the Zionist idea," he said in a June 14 address to Zionist leaders in Israel.

"We are a movement of the Jewish people, not a movement of the elite. We are a democratic movement," said Meridor.

Many Jewish community federations have also criticized the Jewish Agency in recent years, going so far as to reduce their annual campaign allocations to Israel.

But Stephen Solender, UJC's acting president and the executive vice president of UJA-Federation of New York, said in a telephone interview with JTA that the apparent downturn in allocations is deceptive.

"Almost $200 million continues to come to the Jewish Agency from the American federations," he said, calling that "a significant amount of money."

In addition, he said, "more and more federations want to direct some of their funds to specific projects, and one of the reasons that the overall allocations to the agency have diminished, is because more and more federations are directing funds to these particular projects."

Yossi Beilin

The agency's strategic plan, he noted, provides for greater opportunity for federations to direct their funds to specific projects through the agency itself.

Steven Ain, the outgoing executive vice-president of UIA Federations Canada, and recently appointed interim chief operating officer of the UJC believes that the ONAD committee process "is going to show that the vast majority of the Agency's spending is and will be in areas of the highest priority, namely: aliyah and absorption, and development of Israel's north and south."

Ain noted that "anyone who has seen the work that the Jewish Agency performs in the former Soviet Union, or more recently with the Kosovo refugees would think twice before making any suggestion of disbanding the agency."

Canadian federations contributed $23 million (CAD) last year to the Jewish Agency.

Alex Grass of Harrisburg, Pa., the new chair of the agency's Board of Governors, conceded that allocations from the UJA and federations "have gone down somewhat," but affirmed that they remain "very substantial."

Asked about Beilin's Knesset motion, Grass said, "If he had better knowledge as to what the agency has accomplished and continues to accomplish, and if he recognized fully the bond that the agency helps to create between Israel and world Jewry, I think he would recognize his position is totally wrong."

According to the Ha'aretz report, Beilin – who has long called for revolutionary changes in Israel-Diaspora relations – believes the agency has a damaging "monopoly" over the involvement of "Diaspora Jews in Israel and Israelis in Jewish affairs."

A proponent of greater intellectual exchange between the communities, Beilin reportedly proposed the "parliament," which would bring together Jewish luminaries from the humanities, politics and economics.

Solender said, however, that the Jewish Agency is already moving in that direction through its strategic plan.

A refined version of the strategic plan is expected to be approved at the Jewish Agency's board of governors meeting in October.

Rabbi Daniel Allen, the executive vice-chair of UIA, said the agency is "much leaner" than in the past and "partisan politics-free," following bureaucratic reforms during the past decade.

In an interview, he also noted that with the new strategic plan in place, the agency will work with other agencies to deliver services and administer programs, rather than maintaining central control.

Rise for the aged

The other day I took the subway to attend a downtown function. The train was crowded – it was the morning rush hour – and I was lucky to get through the door.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Then an amazing thing happened: A youngster, probably in his teens and on his way to high school, got up and offered me his seat.

I was very grateful to him and engaged him in conversation. He told me that he and his family were fairly recent immigrants, and that he had been taught to respect older people. I would have liked to have talked more to him, but he had reached his destination and was gone, leaving me with very special memories that go back to my own youth.

From the earliest days, I was taught a verse from the Torah – and it was repeated often enough that I could not forget: "Get up before an old person and respect the aged." It is found in the 19th chapter of the Book of Leviticus. For people of my generation – at least in the Old Country – following this command was not only easy, it became second nature.

When I first came to the United States, I was, therefore, greatly astonished that this teaching was widely disregarded; it reminded me that I was in a different environment. For me, somehow, this became an obvious watershed of recognition. The old were respected in the Old Country, but not in the New World.

Since those days, I have not observed any perceptible change. Youngsters will rush through a door ahead of me without a thought of holding it open, revealing that they have not even been taught the ordinary courtesies vis-a-vis other people, let alone to treat the old with special regard and consideration.

While my own age makes me sensitive to matters of this kind, it is not the only factor in assessing our present educational environment. It happens that I have a reserved parking place at Holy Blossom, and I am happy to report that on the whole, people are respectful of keeping it open for me. The only recurrent situation when this courtesy is disregarded is, to me, puzzling and worrisome.

It takes place from time to time when parents take their children to school for some affair and use the open parking space. What happens when the child says to the father or mother: "Isn't this where the rabbi parks?" What does the parent reply? In one case, the offender was the grandfather, which was, in a way, even more puzzling.

It bothers me to think about the example these parents are setting for their children. Holding a door open for someone else, or getting up for the aged does not seem to be a standard teaching. Too bad – being respectful is an important character trait.

It seems that in our youth-oriented culture, it is the young who are teaching the oldsters rather than the other way around.

Golan too valuable to relinquish

I'm puzzled. In the torrent of post-election analysis, assorted politicians, pundits and pollsters weighed in on what Ehud Barak's victory supposedly means for the country. One of the apparent truths of the election results is that Israelis are now ready to give the Golan Heights to Syria in exchange for a peace treaty.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Former prime minister Shimon Peres went so far as to tell an Arab newspaper, almost gleefully, that Barak's triumph at the polls proves that Israelis now recognize that the Golan Heights belongs to Syria. I don't get it.

In recent weeks, the press has often reported on what is now depicted as an almost inevitable Israeli withdrawal from the Golan. According to the media, it's as if, with the election of Barak, many people have crossed some psychological threshold vis-a-vis the Golan, which has been under Israeli control since 1967. An increasing number of Israelis are now allegedly ready to abdicate Israeli sovereignty over the Golan for a possible diplomatic breakthrough with Syria and see the process leading to a retreat from the disputed plateau as irreversible. From such thinking are self-fulfilling prophesies hatched.

This premise of an Israeli change of mind is predicated largely on the recent electoral defeat of the Third Way, the only party that championed the Golan as vital to Israel's future. While it lost its four seats in the Knesset, the Third Way's demise can be attributed to many factors other than a drop in public support of the Golan, especially as the Golan was barely an issue during the campaign.

The peace issue was clearly part of the campaign. And in the interest of peace, mutual compromise is fine. But that shouldn't mean yielding more of the Golan to Damascus. Most people seem to have forgotten that in 1974, Israel already surrendered territory on the Golan to Syria. This despite Syria's major attacks on Israel during the 1973 Yom Kippur War and the 1967 Six Day War, preceded by decades of Syrian shelling from the Golan of Jewish settlements down below.

There is, of course, a price to pay for retaining the Golan but it's smaller than the cost of relinquishing it. Syria plays a dominant role in Lebanon, where Israel loses 25 to 30 young men every year defending its northern border against Syrian-backed Hezbollah forces. And the Golan dispute obviously does little to enhance Israel's stature in the Arab world and in the international arena.

Holding on to the Golan indefinitely is not simple. Indeed, the prospects for a long-term Israeli presence on the Golan are undermined by the precedent of the 1979 Camp David peace accord under which Israel returned the entire Sinai to Egypt. And whether on the left or the right, few are the Israelis not weary of living in a perpetual state of war with Syria and other neighbors.

Still, Israel should keep the Golan. It is vital to the country's security and water supply. It is home to almost 20,000 Jews who for decades have been encouraged by both Labor and Likud governments to settle the land, a land already rich in ancient Jewish roots. But unlike in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, the Jews and the relatively small Arab population on the Golan live together without tension and violence.

It's true the Golan was once under Syria's control – until it invaded Israel in 1967. Six years later during the Yom Kippur War, Syria attacked Israel again. Syria was defeated both times, and as with similar examples throughout history, borders shifted as territory changed hands.

As a tiny, arid country, Israel can ill afford to divest itself of a strategic plateau that's also the source of more than a third of its water. Especially for an agreement with a ruthless dictator notorious for sponsoring terrorism and massive drug dealing.

The Golan's fate is but one of many major issues facing Barak as he takes office as prime minister. His electoral victory, while impressive, did not represent a massive movement toward the left by Israelis. Nor were the election results a blank cheque for him to make major concessions to the Arabs in the peace process. If anything, Barak's win was more of a movement against Benjamin Netanyahu. Many people simply had had enough of the incumbent, and wanted him out.

Barak has promised to hold a national referendum before carrying out a peace deal with Syria that involves any major territorial concession. I hope he keeps his word – so that the people can have the last word.

Freedom for Iranian Jews

The international response to the arrest of the Iranian Jewish leaders is an important test of the moral fibre of the world's leaders and institutions. For centuries, demagogues and dictators have used Jews as hostages and scapegoats. Even after the horrors of the Holocaust, the United Nations, which pretended to be the world's moral authority, did not consider anti-Semitism to be a hate crime. The infamous resolution labeling Zionism as Racism served to encourage and legitimize harassment of Jews. Belatedly, this resolution was repealed, but in some countries, Jews still make a convenient scapegoat.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In Iran, up to 22 Jews from Shiraz and Ishfahan, including a 16-year-old boy, are to be tried for treason and espionage on behalf of "the Zionist regime" and the "Little Satan" (the standard Iranian references for Israel). Iran is a radical Islamic state, run by Ayatollahs who use hatred of Israel to justify their hold on power. Jews who teach their children Hebrew or have any ties with Israel are considered spies. In some areas, they are forced to keep their businesses open on Saturday, and to celebrate the Islamic Sabbath on Friday. Jews are legally not allowed to leave Iran, although since the Islamic fundamentalists came to power, thousands have escaped.

The remaining Jews (estimated to number 20,000) survive through obsequious fealty, in the hope that this will protect them. On Passover, the community leaders issued a statement praying for the "success and prosperity of the Islamic Republic of Iran." For months after the arrests but before they became public, the Jewish community and Israel tried secret diplomacy in order to obtain their release.

This tactic failed (as has happened throughout Jewish history) when the Jews of Iran became caught in the internal power struggle between two factions. While the faction led by President Mohammad Khatami (also an ayatollah) is attempting to increase contacts and trade with the outside world, they are opposed by the stronger ultra-conservatives, led by the Ayatollah Khamenei, the supreme Islamic leader.

For the Jews, and for the rest of the world, the internal squabbles in Iran are irrelevant. In order to save these Iranian Jews from death, the "international community" must demonstrate that Iran will pay very heavily if they are not released, and if the restrictions on immigration and religious practices are not lifted. This approach was successful in winning the release of the Soviet Jews, such as Anatoly (now Natan) Sharansky. The struggle for Soviet Jewry eventually forced open the gates of the Iron Curtain, allowing hundreds of thousands to leave, and also contributed to the collapse of the communist dictatorship.

In contrast, a number of western countries have maintained diplomatic and economic links with the Iranian government, despite the support for terrorism, the denunciation of Israel and the peace process, and the effort to acquire missiles and weapons of mass destruction to threaten Israel.

These links are often justified in terms of a "critical dialogue," claiming that by engaging the Islamic leaders in Iran in a discussion of human rights and terrorism, their positions can be moderated. Furthermore, in the struggle between the "moderates" and "hard liners," trade and dialogue are seen as a means of strengthening the former, led by Khatami.

The evidence to support this theory has never been strong, and now, with the arrest of the Iranian Jews, it is clear that the radicals are dominant in the most crucial policy areas. Economic aid, trade, and invitations to Iranian government leaders strengthen their power and increase the threats to their own citizens (not only the Jews), to Israel, and to the other countries in the region. A dialogue of the deaf is useless.

In this context, the initial response of the world leaders has been encouraging. The Canadian government has been particularly strong in its support for the Iranian Jews. Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy was one of the first to express concerns, demanding assurances from the Iranian government "that the judicial process will be fair, and will conform to the norms of international human rights law."

However, to be effective, these statements need to be supported by deeds.

Canada must also be prepared to sever all links with Iran, despite the costs to Canadian economic interests. As one of the world's leading "moral powers," such clear actions by Canada can play an important role in leading Western Europe and the United Nations in a campaign to free the Jewish hostages.

As in the fight for the freedom of Soviet Jews, the Jewish communities around the world also have an essential role to play. Canadian Jews have already organized demonstrations of support for the Iranian Jews, and similar events have taken place in the United States, France and Israel. Without the active involvement of the supporters of human rights and morality around the world, the Islamic courts of Iran are likely to order the deaths of the new "prisoners of Zion."

The Kirshner File

Trailblazer Marsha Hanen steps down

Marsha Hanen, probably the first Jewish woman to be president of a Canadian university, retired last month after a distinguished career in academia.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Hanen, whose Russian-born father was instrumental in founding Calgary's I.L. Peretz School, stepped down from the presidency of the University of Winnipeg after a decade in office.

"Universities need renewal as much as people do," explained the University of Winnipeg's first female president.

She and her second husband, Robert Weyant, former dean of arts, science and general studies at the University of Calgary, are moving to their summer home in Victoria, B.C.

In retirement, Hanen, 62, plans to unwind, travel, cook, visit her children and grandchildren and indulge her interest in the piano.

"I do not plan to take on further regular academic appointments, though I may do some consulting. I am also considering another interesting opportunity, but have not yet made a decision."

As she prepares to enjoy her autumnal years, Hanen can rest securely in the knowledge that she was a trailblazer.

"I don't know whether I was the first Jewish, female president of a Canadian university," said Hanen. "I never thought about it in those terms. But probably so.

"When I arrived at the University of Winnipeg, there were few women presidents at all. There was certainly talk about my being a woman.

"As to my being Jewish, I'm sure there were questions in the minds of people who believe that, given the strong historical ties of the University of Winnipeg to the United Church, a president should be from that denomination. But if there were fears, they were not expressed to me."

As far as she can ascertain, anti-Semitism was never a factor in her career. "I was much more conscious of the ways in which being a woman challenged people's stereotypes."

As an academic, Hanen juggled the rigors of scholarship with the responsibilities of motherhood. When she arrived at the University of Calgary's philosophy department in 1966, she had two daughters, aged one and 10, to care for.

"It was difficult," said Hanen, whose first husband was an aspiring architect. "There was a lot of criticism in those days of women working when they had children, and that has changed somewhat. But the logistics, organization and demands are still there."

"I was certainly interested in my academic career," she added. "But my role as a mother was my most important one."

Margaret Osler, a University of Calgary historian who knows Hanen, said of her: "She learned early to pack vast amounts of time left to her between studies and her domestic responsibilities, a skill that has served her well as she travelled down the road to academic administration."

Hanen was born in Calgary on Sept. 18, 1936 to Ben and Rowena Pearlman, who had settled in the city in the 1920s. Her only sibling, Ron Pearlman, is a professor of biology at York University in Toronto.

"My father was a bottler of beverages – 7-Up principally. My mother was a teacher, and was very active in the Jewish community.

"My parents, like many Jewish people who immigrated to Canada in the early part of this century, believed that education was the most important thing. They both were actively involved in education. My father was one of the founders of the Peretz School in 1928, and remained active there for over 50 years.

"My mother was the first kindergarten teacher at the school, taught off and on for many years, chaired the Peretz School board of education and contributed her expertise in a variety of ways. She was active in a great many organizations and venues, and set a kind of example as a strong and committed woman, supportive of other women."

And during World War II, she noted, her parents helped refugees from Nazi-occupied Europe to settle in Canada.

Not surprisingly, they had a formative influence on Hanen. "Marsha's own life," observed Osler, "embodies the values underlying these activities: a strong commitment to education and a deep concern for community problems. She expresses these values in her devotion to higher education and feminism."

Marsha Hanen

After high school, Hanen studied at the University of Toronto and Boston University, finishing her BA (high honors in philosophy) at Brown University, where she also she completed her MA. Her PhD is from Brandeis University.

Yet music was always an integral component of her life. At six, she started playing the piano, a pastime that has sustained her since. She might have become a professional pianist had she been convinced she had the temperament to be one.

Before being offered the presidency of the University of Winnipeg, which has 4,345 full-time and 2,175 part-time students, Hanen held academic positions at the University of Pennsylvania, Harvard, Brandeis, Dalhousie and Calgary universities.

At Calgary, she began as an assistant professor. A full professor by 1980, she was subsequently promoted to associate dean (curriculum and staff) of the faculty of general studies. In 1986, she was named dean.

Hanen's work in philosophy of law and of science, feminist theory and epistemology has yielded three published books and numerous articles and reviews.

Her books, co-authored or co-edited with colleagues, include Science, Pseudo-Science and Society; Science, Morality and Feminist Theory; and Archaeology and the Methodology of Science.

The University of Winnipeg hired her because she was the logical choice for the job. "She seemed to personify all the qualities we were looking for," said Gordon McKinnon, who headed the presidential search committee. "She had solid academic credentials, proven administrative and managerial experience, people skills and a willingness to develop external relationships."

Clearly, Hanen lived up to expectations. "It is difficult to speak about my single most important achievement. But I suppose I am most pleased by the increased recognition and respect that has come to the university, by some interesting curriculum development, by an improvement in our funding after more than 30 years of trying, and by some significant improvements to the campus."

During her presidency, Hanen also initiated exchange programs with the Hebrew University and Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, and served on their advisory councils.

Asked how she wants to be remembered, she replied, "As someone who listened and tried to make good things happen."

By all accounts, Hanen was a feminist administrator, having been inclusive, democratic and consultative.

A recipient of the Order of Canada, Hanen was for years chair of the board of the Peretz School (which eventually amalgamated with the Talmud Torah). As a child, she attended the school, as did her daughters, Sharon (who recently recently wrote her doctorate thesis for Leeds University) and Amy (director of learning systems at the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce in Toronto).

Thanks to her parents, Hanen can speak and read Yiddish. But, as she pointed out, her Yiddish is "very rusty" due to the fact that she rarely uses it these days.

Scrutinizing censorship

Books
Bernard Baskin

The New Anti-Liberals*, by A. Alan Borovoy (Canadian Scholar's Press, $18.95).

Should Ernst Zundel be legally prohibited from spreading falsehoods about the Holocaust? Are you in favor of anti-hate laws, even if they run counter to the democratic tradition of free speech? Has the time come for pornography, in its various forms, to be outlawed? Should universities introduce speech codes to protect the rights of students – especially those from minority groups? Should a man accused of rape have no right to probe the sexual background of his accuser? Are you in favor of special rights (affirmative action) in employment and university admission for those who traditionally are victims of discrimination? Do you approve of mandatory minimum jail sentences?

If you answer these questions in the affirmative, then, suggests the author of this controversial book, you are part of a new group of anti-liberals, "promoters of equality who have gone off the deep end."

For the past 30 years, Alan Borovoy has been general counsel of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association. Previously, he directed the anti-racist Labor Committee for Human Rights. He is a well known and hard fighting egalitarian who has always opposed discrimination based on race, creed, ethnicity, gender and sexual orientation.

Now, the author reluctantly opposes his erstwhile liberal allies, those who want to promote their objectives in contravention of values that he asserts are the very essence of the democratic system. Among his targets are extremist feminists, the Canadian Jewish Congress, irresponsible black leaders, radical peace activists, and many provincial and federal government agencies.

Borovoy criticizes the Canadian Jewish Congress for advocating anti-hate laws and similar pro-censorship positions in order to silence anti-Semites. He believes that democracies should seek "not to muzzle racists, but to marginalize them. It's too dangerous for the law to censor; it's appropriate for citizens to censure. Instead of trying to stop racists from speaking, it's usually better to focus on reducing their impact. It would also help to improve the administration and enforcement of our anti-discrimination laws that deal with the serious racial and ethnic problems – in areas such as jobs and housing."

At this stage of history and in the foreseeable future, Canadians, he feels, have more to fear from the censorship powers of their governments than from the racism of extremists.

Unhappily, anti-hate laws can be used against proper and legitimate dissenters. This has happened to anti-American protesters, French Canadian Nationalists, a pro-Zionist book, and a Jewish leader. What are we afraid of, wonders the author. The neo-Nazi movement in Canada is so small and so universally denounced as to be powerless.

Misguided feminists are faulted for a number of their actions: accusing Harry Arthurs of York University – probably the country's most liberal and pro-feminist university president – of sexist discrimination; accusing June Callwood, a compassionate feminist leader, of sexism; and accusing the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, for being a "macho, male-focused organization with no sensitivity to women."

Feminist attempts to outlaw pornography are understandable but misplaced. "To whatever extent pornography is seen as producing sexist attitudes, there is a range of activity that could help to produce anti-sexist attitudes – these measures would very likely produce much greater benefits for the women of our society than could ever be achieved by these dangerous and dubious attempts to restrict pornography."

The New Anti-Liberals deserves a wide readership. It is well reasoned, informed, deeply felt and courageous. It should stimulate thought and discussion on a variety of contentious and pertinent issues.

Ask the Rabbi – on line

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Nothing can compare to the personal and trusting relationship that someone can establish with a rabbi. However, there are times when people have a question that's nagging them, and they have no one to turn to. That's when they might want to ask the rabbi – on line.

There are dozens of rabbis on the Internet who welcome your most basic, advanced or outrageous questions. Don't worry. They're pretty hard to shock.

But before you dash off your question, a couple of thoughts. Make sure that the rabbi you question is reputable. Anyone with a keyboard can call himself or herself a "rabbi," so check them out before you put any stock in their answer. And, as most online rabbis make very clear on their Web sites, their service is meant only to address general questions. All complicated problems should be directed to a reliable authority.

So let's start with a sampling of sites. The Union of American Hebrew Congregations has put together a large site which welcomes questions and addresses some common queries about Reform Judaism [http://uahcweb.org/askunion.html]. A typical question: Is it true you can't be buried in a Jewish cemetery if you have a tattoo. The response: Judaism teaches us that our bodies belong, as do all parts of nature, to God. Any sort of mutilation of the body is, therefore, prohibited. Tattooing is prohibited, as are some forms of elective cosmetic surgery. Although there are offences that are so heinous as to bar someone from being buried in the Jewish cemetery, a tattoo is not one of them.

Temple Shaaray Tefila of New York also welcomes questions and has posted explanations about some common inquiries about wearing kippot, the details of Yizkor and the proper time to leave the sanctuary. (Quietly, and never while the Ark is open.) [http://shamash.org./reform/uahc/congs/ny/ny039/askrab2.htm] If you'd like to pose questions to the Conservative movement, there is the Masorti Web site in the U.K. [http://www.masorti.org.uk/amasorti.htm] which also includes a summary of major practices. Rabbi Vernon Kurtz of Chicago's Conservative Synagogue Beth El welcomes your questions [http://www.nssbethel.org/ask.htm] as does Rabbi Joseph Amsterdam of Adat Ari Synagogue in North Orange County, Calif. [http://www.uscj.org/pacsw/anaheimhills/askus.htm].

Over at Project Genesis, you can pose a question to their resident CyberSage [http://www.torah.org/info/asktherabbi.html]. Project Genesis is one of the few sites where questioners are asked to supply background about themselves because responding in a vacuum is a difficult task. Theirs is intended to be a private, confidential service for people who do not have access to a rabbi.

If you don't mind going public, then try out Project Genesis' interactive Torah-Forum [http://www.torah.org/learning/torah-forum/].

You'll find discussions on such varied topics as women wearing pants, Judaism and extra-terrestrials, and even kashrut and grasshoppers.

(Although most insects are treif, did you know that according to the Torah, some grasshoppers and locusts are actually kosher? However since most Jews do not have a continuous tradition of eating them, we refrain from indulging. Yemenite Jews, however, do have that tradition. So unless you are a Yemeni, you're out of luck.)

Next week, we'll meet some more rabbis who answer questions on line, including Rabbi Shmuley Boteach, author of Kosher Sex.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

The nature of leadership

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Since the present mantra in Jewish education is not actually continuity, but leadership, it is instructive to review the career of Moshe, the prophet who stands above all others.

Moshe is described as "very humble, more than any man on earth." (Numbers 12:3) The description is noteworthy for what it leaves out – there is no mention that Moshe is the smartest or strongest or even the most righteous man. Rather, his overriding quality is humility, a trait that we may not ordinarily associate with leadership.

The Torah seeks to draw special attention to his embodiment of this quality precisely because Moshe would have the most reason to boast. The Talmud comments that Moshe's perception of God was clearer than that of any other human being, past or future, that he achieved the highest level of spiritual awareness possible in our mortal vale of tears.

Yet Moshe's attitude is not that of arrogance resulting from superior knowledge. Instead, the very ability to access God in this way produced in the prophet a profound sense of his own limitations, as though in coming close to God, he realized better than anyone else the boundaries of human knowledge and human abilities.

Moshe was not a person who secretly yearned to be the only one to speak to God, as he tells Joshua: "Would that all the Lord's people were prophets, and that God would put His spirit upon them." (Numbers 11:29) Far from jealously guarding his own unique access to the divine, he sincerely desired that others could share in that spiritual glory.

Anachronistic though it may be to apply contemporary psychological categories to historical figures, we might venture that with all of his humility, Moshe did not suffer from a lack of "self-esteem."

His approach is exemplified in the aftermath of the golden calf incident, where he makes it clear that he will have nothing to do with any "substitute" Jewish people in the wake of God's proposed destruction of the present flock. Uninterested in the glory that he can gain from being immortalized in the Torah, his actions bespeak the first rule of leadership – one's allegiance must be to ensuring that the people be given an opportunity to redeem themselves.

Yet it is this same Moshe who, upon actually witnessing the golden calf with his own eyes, takes the two tablets containing the Ten Commandments and smashes them to the ground without the slightest hesitation.

Commenting on this incident, Rabbi Meir Simcha of Dvinsk (Germany, 18th century), illuminates a central point in Judaism. He writes: "Even the tablets, with the writing of God, are not holy in themselves, but are so only because of you, if you observe them. [But if not, then the tablets] are considered as base pottery, for they have no sanctity in themselves, but only become such when you observe them. In conclusion, there is nothing in the world that is holy [unless you endow it with holy actions prescribed by the Torah].

Rabbi Meir Simcha delivers a profound statement on the nature of religious objects. The Torah, the land of Israel, the Temple – all are sacred only if we do not make a mockery of religion. The Jewish leader must guide us into the rich grove of Jewish observance, but then direct our vision to the great clearing beyond the trees – the promised land where the spiritual core of Judaism lies waiting.

This generation of students wants its meanings to be authentic, and in rejecting pat answers, they have thrown down the gauntlet to the Jewish leaders of our time. They await a response.

Volunteers make a difference

By WILLIAM ROSENTHAL

I would like to share with you some of my experiences and the knowledge I have gained since joining the volunteer brigade at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care in 1991.

Guest Voices

I have found that no matter how limited they appeared to be, the elderly people with whom I came into contact, seemed to have an underlying reservoir of energy and spirituality.

This was first made evident to me some years ago during a daily prayer service. Some of the participants complained that the baal tfillah who was leading the services that day did not know how to daven.

Some complained about his accent; some did not like his "Polish nusach" (liturgical style).

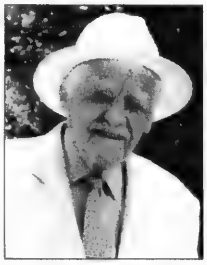
Despite their age and obvious physical disabilities, a lively, energetic and spirited discussion ensued among the group members.

This experience convinced me that there is a dormant reservoir of vitality in many residents that can be tapped to improve their well-being.

How, I asked myself, can we activate and stimulate their awareness, despite their apparent withdrawal?

The answer, I believe, is to win their friendship and trust – a challenging, educational and rewarding experience.

To do this, we need to use words and action. By words, I mean talking with them – inquiring, for example, about their families, their shtetls, their occupations or professions, their religious views, or the kinds of music they like. Compliment them on their appearance.



William Rosenthal

Action refers to physical contact. Make the residents feel they are wanted by putting your arm around their shoulders or holding their hand.

Once you have captured their interest and attention, you can maintain it and stimulate it by continuing to offer your companionship.

In addition to feeling that you are helping make life more worthwhile for another human being, you will find volunteering an eye-opening experience that will help bring into focus the realities of your own life.

You will see people enjoying life even though they are incapacitated to some degree, and in comparison, your own ailments will appear less serious. You may then be better able to appreciate your own physical and mental abilities and that may make you a happier person.

Volunteers come from different backgrounds and have different talents. But, regardless of which department you choose to participate in, you will note at some point that you have put a twinkle in the eye of a resident, or you will see his or her face light up with a smile.

Then you will feel a great inner satisfaction and sense of accomplishment. You will realize that we as volunteers can and do make a difference.

And you will be performing a great mitzvah, v'hadarta pnai zaken (paying respect to an elderly person).

Get involved, because somebody out there is waiting for you.

William Rosenthal recently received a certificate for more than 1,000 hours of volunteer work at the Baycrest Centre.

Centenarian doesn't look his age

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — A stranger attending a meeting of the Yiddish cultural club at the Borochov Centre would be hard-pressed to identify the centenarian in the group.

That's because William Katz, 101, a regular contributor at the Borochov cultural club, looks at least 15 years younger than his chronological age.

He is dapper in a beige suit and red tie, as he dons his glasses to read a poem by I.L. Peretz.

He also participates in the weekly Yiddish literature club at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, and on Thursday mornings he co-leads the Yiddish book club at the Morris Winchevsky Centre.

In an interview in the apartment he has occupied for some 30 years – he lives there independently – Katz eagerly discusses some of the literary works he has recently presented at the literary groups he attends.

He pores over an essay by Chaim Greenberg about Jonah and the whale, and he eagerly explains the author's view as to why this story is read on Yom Kippur.

"This is a very interesting article," he says, translating and summarizing it as he speaks. "It shows God's pity for people. He doesn't want them to be sinners."

Several well-worn Yiddish books sit in neat piles on the dining room table next to a large picture of Katz' two great-grandchildren, Daniel and Emily. More Yiddish books are on the bookcase in the living room.

Katz' love affair with Yiddish literature began after he immigrated to Canada in 1920, he says.

Growing up in a chassidic community in the Polish shtetl of Dzialochic, the only reading materials available to him were the Talmud and the Bible. In Canada, however, he could obtain Yiddish books on every subject imaginable, he says. "It was an open world."

William Katz

His great-grandfather, a rabbi, came from a long line of rabbis, and one of his grandmothers also came from a rabbinical family, he says.

Katz left Poland in 1919 to avoid the draft. He worked in Germany for a year and by chance was able to get free passage to Canada in 1920. His ticket was paid for by his cousin's American uncle.

He arrived in Canada with $25, borrowed from a friend. He had been given the Toronto address of the Shidlowsky family, relatives of a friend.

He says it was love at first sight when he met the Shidlowsky's daughter, Bluma. They married in 1922 and had one daughter, Ida Abrams, who has five children. Bluma died in 1972.

In the mid-'20s, Katz was able to sponsor his brother and two sisters. He says he maintains a close relationship with his two surviving siblings, both of whom are in their 90s. "We're a very close-knit family. We speak very often."

He worked at a number of jobs in the apparel industry, from hatmaking to embroidery, and he helped found the embroidery local of the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union.

He says that because of his union work, he became known as a "lefty" and had some difficulty finding work. In the mid-'20s he couldn't get a job in Canada, and he had to work in Chicago to support his wife and daughter.

Katz is a charter member of the Labor League Mutual Benefit Society, now the United Jewish People's Order (UJPO). He has served in many executive positions at UJPO and continues to be active, attending a lodge brunch and executive meeting monthly.

He says that until about 1950, he championed socialism because it offered the possibility of equality for the socially and economically disadvantaged. However, he became disillusioned with the movement after Jewish poets and intellectuals in the former Soviet Union were murdered by the state in the early '50s.

In 1930, Katz became a partner in a small embroidery shop on Adelaide Street, where he worked until his retirement in 1972.

Until he was in his late 90s, he used to go folkdancing regularly with a group of friends, but he says he had to give that up because he is not as steady on his legs now.

However, Katz still manages to stay busy. He keeps up to date with current events and is in regular contact with family members. He cooks and cleans, and he makes time for his beloved Yiddish books.

Katz believes that he has had good health and a long life because he does not let himself get aggravated. "I'm not an envious person. I look on the brighter side of the world."

His daughter agrees wholeheartedly, noting that her father always accepted his lot in life. "He lived modestly, but he was always happy with what he had."

Go-cart drivers hit the track for Hebrew University

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — On a recent Sunday morning 125 amateur go-cart drivers of all ages donned their helmets to compete in the first Playdium 200 Charity Go-Cart Challenge, a 200 km race, that raised more than $64,000 for cancer research at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem

Cheered on by family and friends, the drivers whirled around the track at Playdium, a large indoor/outdoor family recreation complex in Mississauga, for three hours.

This event, organized by Steven Warsh, 43, president of Playdium, and his three bothers, twins Neil and Robin, 45, and Brian, 40, was a unique way to raise funds for cancer research while honoring the memory of their mother Fay Warshafsky, who died of cancer.

Robin told The CJN that he and his brothers thought, "what better way to honor our mother's spirit than to hold a charitable event that raised money for cancer research, one where the whole family can give and have a fun day together."

The money raised will be directed to the newly established Fay Warshafsky Endowment Fund for Cancer Research at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

In presenting a cheque to Jack Frieberg, past president of the Toronto Chapter of the Hebrew University, Steven Warsh said, "the fundraising, which was an overwhelming success, will help one of the top cancer research facilities in the world.

"We may see many forms of cancer curable in our lifetime. The funds raised today will bring us a little closer to that day."

He added that "next year we hope to expand the activities for this annual fundraising event by including more individual and family participation. It will raise additional funds for cancer research and everyone will have a great time."

Throughout the morning, which began with breakfast and ended with a barbecue lunch, both participants and supporters enjoyed the many activities at Playdium – miniature golf, rock climbing, baseball batting, and interactive games.

Others danced to the music of the Mandell Entertainment Group while MC Michael Landsberg kept the momentum at a high level with his witty quips.

The funds were raised through corporate and individual sponsorships of teams and individual donations.

The Warshafsky family are seen at the Playdium fundraiser for cancer research at the Hebrew University. From left, Brian, Robin, their father Max, Neil and Steven.

Trophies, racers' shirts, briefcases, team photos and prizes, including a day at the Bridgestone High Performance Racing Academy in Shannonville and tickets for the Molson Indy, enhanced the excitement of the day.

Top winners of the go-cart team event were Smith Barney Asset Management team and the Michael Jordan & The Bulls 99 team. There was even a Chicken Award.

Committee members of the first annual event included Jay Waks, Michael Konikoff and Charles Taerk.

חזרתי משהות קצרה בארץ. הבאתי איתי את "מעריב" של יום א' ה- 13 ליוני. והינה הכותרות: "המשטרה: צריך לחפש כלי נשק בבתי הספר". "מת הילד שהוצת על ידי אביו". "נחשפה כנופיה אלימה ביותר של בני 17 שסחטה בני נוער". "אשדוד: אב נורה ונפצע בבטנו על ידי אב אחר בעקבות קטטה בין ילדיהם". " עמק האלכוהול בחיפה: 12 סכינים נתפסו אצל בני נוער". "נער בירושלים רצח נער אחר בדקירת סכין בעקבות סיכסוך קצר". היו עוד כותרות בנושא, אבל יש לי הרגשה שהבנתם את הרעיון.: קורה משהו חמור ביותר בארץ הקודש. בראיון טלביזיה דיווח פרופ. בנבנישתי מהאוניברסיטה העברית שכתשעים אחוז מהתלמידים בארץ מדווחים שהרביצו להם מכות בבית הספר וכשנים עשר אחוזים נושאים איתם "נשק קר" להגנה אישית (סכינים שונות). לדברי החוקר, אחוזים אלה גבוהים יותר מאשר נשיאת הסכינים על ידי ילדי לטינו בקליפורניה! מה הסיבה? ללא כל ספק - לגיטימציה מאסיבית לאלימות בכל הרמות: ברמה המילולית, ברמת סרטים וסרטי הטלביזיה שילדים יכולים לראות, וכמובן - ברמה הלאומית: כל ישראלי בר גיוס נושא עימו נשק שיכול להרוג אנשים אחרים. מי שנמצא בצבא - ממילא האלימות הופכת עבורו לנושא מרכזי: איך להרוג ביעילות, איך לפגוע, איך להוציא מפעילות. רמת האלימות המילולית ממש מדהימה לישראלי שבא לבקר מצפון אמריקה ושאוזנו כבר התרגלה לנימוס ולמתינות הקנדית: הצורה שאנשים מדברים זה לזה בכנסת, ברחוב, בעיתונות - פשוט לא תיאמן!

כותבת אישה מרמת-גן ב"מכתבים למערכת": איננו מאפשרים לבננו בן העשר לצפות בתוכנית של יצפן ביום שישי בערב, כי הוא משתמש במושגים כמו "אשתך המזדרגגת", "לך חפש את אחותך המתפמפמת" (ביטוי חדש לקיום יחסי מין"). וכל זה בשעות פריים טיים! ביום שישי בערב במדינת היהודים.. ילד ישראלי שפותח את "ידיעות אחרונות" בימים המתאימים, יכול למצוא מודעות סקס בשפה שהיתה נורמת גם לתגרנים של שוק הכרמל להסמיק. מסתבר שבבתי ספר עממיים רבים (עד כיתה ו'), וכמובן -יותר בחטיבת הביניים ובתיכון - פועלות כנופיות של ילדים אלימים שלוקחות מילדים אחרים את ארוחת העשר שלהם, כסף, או כל דבר אחר, ללא הגנה ממשית של בית הספר. אתה שומע הורים מדברים בתוכניות רדיו ואיך מאמין שזה קורה בבתי ספר יהודיים -ישראליים במדינת ישראל. מתברר שבתי ספר רבים פוחדים "מהשם הרע" שיצא להם, ואינם מעוניינים לערב את המשטרה. והפיתרון הראשוני הרי הוא פשוט מאין כמותו: בבוקר, ללא הכנה מיוחדת , צריך לבקש מכל הילדים לרוקן את תיקיהם ובגדיהם, וכל ילד שיש ברשותו סכין או כל כלי אחר נזרק מבית הספר, מזמינים את הוריו לאזהרה, ובתקרית הבאה פותחים נגדו ונגד הילד תיק פלילי. זה כמובן רעיון פשטני ושטחי - אבל גם אותו לא עשו עדיין. ולמרות כל הדיבורים - ממשיכים הסכינאים לאיים על ילדים החל מכיתה דלת והיא. ממש לא יאומן!

בדיחה חדשה ששמעתי בארץ, שמעידה על הלך הרוח לאחר הבחירות האחרונות : הקב"ה שולח את מלאך המוות להביא את אבינדור ליברמן, ח"כ מטעם "ישראל ביתינו", אחת המפלגות הרוסיות, ששמו נקשר (ללא הוכחה) בפשע המאורגן הרוסי. מבקש ממנו ליברמן מספר דקות להתארגן. בינתיים נכנסים לחדר מספר גברתנים ומכניסים למלאך המוות מכות רצח, והוא מצליח בקושי לחזור לשמיים.

"הבאת את ליברמן?" שואל הקב"ה. "איפה הבאתי ! הם גמרו אותי במכות," עונה המלאך. מחוויר הקב"ה ואומר למלאך: " תשמע, אני מקווה שלא אמרת להם מי שלח אותך!"

Carleton political economist explores trade with the U.S.

Academia

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In terms of size and magnitude, there is no trading relationship like it anywhere else in the world.

Close to $1.5 billion worth of goods and service flow across Canada's border into the United States every day. Canada, in turn, is the United States' most important customer.

Carleton University political economist Maureen Appel Molot has made a career of studying and clarifying this integral aspect of Canada's relations with its powerful southern neighbor.

Currently on a year's leave as director of Carleton's Norman Paterson School of International Affairs, Molot is an authority on two of the strongest components of Canada's economic partnership with the United States: the Canada-U.S. auto industry and the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), an outgrowth of the Free Trade Agreement.

During her current sabbatical, Molot has been working on several projects related to her specialties: Canada's auto tariff policy, Canadian and Mexican auto parts manufacturers, and NAFTA.

A graduate of McGill University and the University of California (Berkeley), she is a respected scholar in her field. She is the editor of Driving Continentally: National Policies and the North American Auto Industry.

And she is the author of numerous papers on free trade and Canadian foreign economic policy, which have appeared in journals such as Canadian Business Economics, Canadian Public Policy and Jerusalem Journal of International Relations.

"I've long been interested in the politics of economic decisions," said Molot, a faculty member of Carleton's political science department. "Our economic well-being is so closely tied to the United States. But too few Canadians pay close attention to what is happening in the United States."

How many Canadians, for instance, know that the United States purchases 83 percent of Canada's exports, and that 68 percent of Canadian imports are from the United States?

"Figures recently released indicate that the dollar value of Canadian exports to the United States has doubled over the past five years," she said.

What is more, the United States remains the biggest source of direct investment coming into Canada.

Molot's fascination with the auto industry is hardly surprising, since it is critical to Canada's continued prosperity. "It accounts for 12 percent of Canada's manufacturing gross domestic product. It is our most important manufacturing industry by far."

Although consumers in Canada buy less than 10 percent of North American cars, vans and trucks, Canadian plants churn out about 16 percent of North America's vehicles. "The auto industry," she explained, "drives Ontario's economy."

Maureen Appel Molot

In her view NAFTA is good for Canada. "I support agreements that reduce the barriers to trade and investment. Small open economies like Canada benefit from well-established rules of international economic exchange."

Since NAFTA's enactment, there has been an enormous increase in Canadian trade with the United States and Mexico. "We are exporting and importing a great deal more than we did before 1989."

Exports, imports have increased

And under the rules of the game, most trade disputes are resolved before they escalate, she added.

Molot realizes that some Canadians are unhappy with NAFTA. "At one level, I understand the critics. For the most part, they worry about job losses. Yet the record shows otherwise."

Its detractors, she argued, have not succeeded in demonstrating a link between NAFTA and, for example, plant closures. "The economy is simply too complex to be able to single out one causal factor."

In line with her interest in Canada's political economy, Molot tracks Canadian foreign policy.

"There are probably more constants than changes in our foreign policy," she said. "We remain a staunch supporter of international organizations, both security and economic.

"We have maintained close ties with the United States and our other major allies. We continue to be concerned with the plight of the less fortunate."

The end of the Cold War, however, has brought changes, some of which are reflected in Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy's emphasis on "human security" issues and his search for a land mines treaty.

Asked if Canada's foreign policy is really independent, she replied, "This is a somewhat tired question. We certainly have acted and continue to act differently from the United States."

Molot cited three examples: Canada's friendly conduct toward Cuba, Canada's early recognition of the People's Republic of China (her MA thesis topic), and Canada's trail-blazing position vis-a-vis land mines.

Molot, whose PhD dissertation was entitled A Common Market for Capital: Indicator of Canada-U.S. Integration, has been teaching at Carleton since 1968, having risen from sessional lecturer to full professor. She has taught courses ranging from comparative politics to Canada's political economy.

Before Carleton hired her, she was a research assistant on the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism.

Born in Ottawa, Molot comes from an east European family that settled in Canada before World War I. Her father Toby – he recently celebrated his 87th birthday – owned a small business. Her mother, Rebecca Morris, who raised four children and helped her husband in his business, died in 1967.

Molot has been married to Henry, a senior general counsel in the federal Department of Justice, since 1967.

They have two children, a son, Alex, who is pursuing a doctorate degree in Judaic studies and European history at New York University, and a daughter, Edie, who majors in history and has just completed her third year at Brandeis University.

Molot is proud of her activities as a volunteer in Ottawa's Jewish community.

From 1991-93, she was president of the Vaad Ha'Ir. She has also been a member of the Vaad's executive and chair of its community relations committee, as well as chair of the Council of Jewish Federations' campus services and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services committees.

Survivor seeking a home for paintings of the Holocaust

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sara Kogan Rabinovitch, 71, a Holocaust survivor, has more than 100 large paintings of the Holocaust, which have no permanent home.

She is hoping that some generous patron of the arts will establish a gallery to house the paintings of Yelfin Cimkin, a one-armed 81-year-old Russian Yiddish painter who resides in Moscow.

The large canvasses, are now lying unframed, piled one on top of the other, in two bedrooms in Rabinovitch's apartment on Sheppard Avenue.

"I want people to realize what happened to Jews and that not only Jews were killed," said Rabinovitch.

A Canadian resident for nine years, she made six separate trips to Moscow to collect the paintings, paying all the expenses of transporting them herself.

The paintings are realistic depictions of Holocaust victims, including some at Babi Yar, which the artist visited. They have an ethereal, haunting quality and are well preserved.

Rabinovitch, who was born in the Ukraine, is related to Shalom Aleichem on her father's side. Her maternal ancestors were members of the Breslove academy of rabbis.

Her own tales of survival are horrifying. During the Nazis' invasion of Russia, Rabinovitch, who was only 13 at the time, was taken to the ghetto at Tuchin.

Initially, her freedom was purchased by her parents, who were forced to give her captors gold, silver and diamonds.

"My mother was brutally killed by the Nazis when she was only 39. I had been taken to another camp and my mother tried to leave the Pechora camp to go looking for me.

"She was captured and beaten with heavy boots until her body was a mass of blood, broken bones and soil. They threw her on top of a pile of dead bodies.

"She tried to resist to the last moment and they kept kicking her in the face and threw her into the woods.

"No one was permitted to bury her. When my father heard about what happened, he had a massive heart attack and died on the spot."

Rabinovitch is a volunteer at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, and a frequent speaker at the Holocaust Education Centre and Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living.

Her husband, Herschel, died in Moscow in 1985. She has a daughter, Ludmilla Chvartszaid, who is a Toronto resident and a son, Ilya Kogan, who lives in New York.

Rabinovitch speaks Yiddish and can be reached at 638-6498.

Middle East peace program struggles to find funding

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – A McGill University program training Israelis, Palestinians and Jordanians to be peace ambassadors in the Middle East, praised for its innovation and courage, has failed so far to attract all the funds it needs to fulfil its ambitious plans.

In May, 1998, then minister for international cooperation Diane Marleau pledged $3 million from the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) towards the McGill Middle East Program in Civil Society and Peace Building, which was then completing its pilot year. The extra funds allowed the program to expand from four students – two Israelis and two Jordanians – to 12 equally from Israel, Jordan and the Palestinian Authority (PA), and to include McGill's school of architecture, as well as social work.

The CIDA grant, payable over three years, was conditional on the program's raising matching funds in cash or in kind, said Prof. Jim Torczyner, director of the program.

During the 1998-99 academic year, the program had to raise $830,000. By June, $650,000 had been raised, mostly from within the McGill community, Torczyner said.

Fund-raising will be stepped up, he said, especially in the three states involved. For the purposes of this program, the PA is already regarded as a country.

Outgoing McGill Chancellor Gretta Chambers said McGill remains "deeply and irrevocably committed" to the program, which she praised as "unique and forward-looking" and "a leap of faith" by the three peoples involved.

The slowness of fund-raising did not dampen the farewell reception for this year's fellows, all graduate students in either social work or architecture. The 11 (one dropped out because of academic difficulties) had been at McGill since September studying individually in their respective fields and together in a multi-disciplinary course, designed especially for them, about how to improve the lot of the disadvantaged in order that their societies, ultimately, become more equitable and peaceful.

They are only halfway through their program. In the coming year, they will be associated with practice centres in their respective homelands, where they will be expected to put into practice what they learned at McGill.

Exchange ideas

Storefront-style community organizations, modelled on Montreal's Project Genesis, which was founded by Torczyner over 20 years ago, are being established in Amman, East Jerusalem and Nablus, and the existing Israeli Genesis centres in Acre, Beersheva and Jerusalem are being enhanced. The Genesis model stresses educating and organizing the poor to fight for their rights and improve their lives.

In the spirit of the McGill program, this year's fellows are expected to be in contact with each other, to continue the dialogue they have begun on how to tackle social issues common to the Middle East.

McGill's partners in this program are the Palestinian universities, An-Najah and Al-Quds, the University of Jordan, the Jordanian Red Crescent Society, and Ben-Gurion University. Quebec Superior Court judge Herbert Marx chairs the international executive committee.

One of the fellows, Jordanian Abdel Karim Al-Fayez said, "Working for peace is not only a question of political advances; peace building also means a social transformation.

"Poverty and exclusion breed fundamentalism and violence." Alleviating poverty and ensuring all have an equal voice, he said, will go a long way to make the region more peaceful.

"The Middle East has been tainted by wars that have wasted lives and resources. In the last few years, $200 billion has been spent in the region on arms, and only $15 billion on food.

"...We believe only a just, comprehensive peace that will lead to prosperity can provide true security for the peoples of the Middle East," Al-Fayez said.

Palestinian Najwa Silwadi said the program allowed her the opportunity to exchange ideas with Israelis and Jordanians on how to achieve common goals.

"The Palestinians' have had a difficult struggle to build our state...I hope we can apply the skills we learned at McGill to make the life of the Palestinians easier. They deserve a normal life after their long history of suffering."

"It has inspired us to build a healthy, dynamic society," she said.

Israeli Arab Ghada Abu Jaber described the year as intense, with "some hard moments and some wonderful moments."

Torczyner announced that plans are well under way for the program's third year.

Queen Noor, widow of the late King Hussein of Jordan, has agreed to be the honorary international co-chair of the program, he said, and is expected to visit Montreal next March.

Reuma Weizman, the wife of the Israeli president, has also agreed to use her office to advance the work of Genesis Israel, he said.

The McGill program also got a boost from Israeli Consul General Daniel Gal, who called it a "people-to-people translation of the peace process.

"It is a miracle to see former enemies becoming partners [for] the welfare of the region. And, as Golda Meir said, if you don't believe in miracles, you're not realistic."

The fellows, he added, "have made all of us understand that 'shalom' and 'salaam' are the same language."

CJC backs mediation

the Toronto Board of Rabbis, is interested in what we are doing."

The mediation process would not deal with family law or criminal matters, said Wolfe.

But she said there are people who do not want to take their problems to the beth din who might want the mediation.

The mediation results would not be binding unless the parties agreed to it, she said, adding that there would be no mediation in the first place if both parties did not agree.

Wolfe, a former Montrealer who is on the roster of mandatory mediators available in Toronto for groups who have adopted the practice of mediation, said she hoped to assemble a blue-ribbon panel of high-calibre mediators for the Congress group.

They would be paid an honorarium, she said.

Though there was some discussion about whether a new mediation approach is needed in view of existing bodies, and how it would be financed, the motion passed without opposition.

Wolfe said individuals with problems in their religious affiliation might want to use the mediation approach.

"Congress will be a neutral, third party," said Landy. "It will be outside of Congress but certainly under its ambit."

CJC outreach program holds retreat

TORONTO — A number of Jewish families living in Ontario small communities went to Sudbury or Niagara Falls for weekend retreats under the auspices of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region (CJC).

The CJC's Family Educational Outreach Project is geared to families with children aged 3 to bar/bat mitzvah. The one-year home-study program is organized for parents and children to learn together through weekly information packages, community visits, and family retreats.

Michael Sobol, chair of the CJC community services committee, told the May CJC regional executive meeting that "without strong smaller communities, the entire Jewish community is weakened."

He said the two family weekends were "extraordinarily successful. It is wonderful to walk into a strange place, see mezuzot, walk into a sanctuary, and know you are home."

Regional chair Keith Landy led Shabbat morning services in Sudbury's Shaar Hashomayim Congregation, delivered a sermon, and observed that "CJC staff are welcomed with open arms, and bring vigor to small communities," Sobol said.

Families sent to Sudbury, Niagara Falls

Three teenagers from different small communities in Ontario bond at the Family Educational Outreach Project's southern retreat held in Niagara Falls. They are (from left) Ariella Gross-Sobel, Guelph; Farrah Dalfen, Niagara Falls; and Stacey Walman, Kitchener.

Landy said he was delighted to have had the opportunity to feel the pulse of Ontario small communities – "it is our lifeblood" – and was taken with the fact that Jews living in small communities do not allow distances to prevent them from coming together.

From conversations during the weekend, he came away with knowledge of the necessity for increased contact among small communities and with Congress. He praised CJC staff for their dedication in working with small communities.

Jeff Arbus of Sault Ste. Marie, vice-president of Congregation Beth Jacob, who came to Sudbury with a combined group from both the Ontario and Michigan Sault, called the weekend "very renewing. It gave me a lot of encouragement to return to my community after discussion of some mutual issues of concern. And it was most enlightening to be updated on provincial issues by the CJC Ontario region chair."

Judi Cartman, president of the Sudbury synagogue, said that people felt honored that Landy came to their city. "It shows that he and the CJC personally care about our small communities," she observed.

The Southern Conference held at B'nai Jacob Synagogue in Niagara Falls, hosted families from St. Catharines, Grimsby, Peterborough, Guelph and Kitchener. CJC staffers who attended both retreats included: Michael Soberman, director of community services and youth activities; Leanne Rosen, family and high school outreach coordinator, and Shula Saltzman, senior education consultant. Volunteers included Young Judaea shaliach Ryan Hass, Michael Ostroff of Toronto, and Paula Baruch-Houpt of Peterborough.

Participants at the retreat came together with members of the local community and St. Catharines for a Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration which included Israeli food brought in from Toronto. Shabbat evening services were lead by Steven Orvitz, a community leader from St. Catharines.

In Sudbury, participants travelled from Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario and Michigan, Echo Bay and Thunder Bay. Volunteers included Ostroff and Morris Glazman and Ari Shapiro of Toronto. Arbus led the havdalah service.

The day in mitzvah land had children rotating through five stations – Shabbat, Shavuot, tzedakah, tikkun olam and welcoming guests.

Saltzman said, "It was great for me to meet people who I had been dealing with on e-mail or phone, and to share ideas in person of what outreach families have been doing and could be doing."

Fred Ball of Thunder Bay, declared that "it is vitally important for people who struggle to maintain Judaism in these small communities to share issues of concern. It is important to network and to build bridges with people in different communities."

Gabrielle Abramsky of Peterborough, who attended the retreat with husband David and children Alanna, 12, and Daniela, 10, said she appreciated the discussions about problems in small communities; such as maintaining Jewish identity and celebrating Jewish holidays, and the lack of availability of resources.

Marilyn Gamble of Kitchener said four families from her community came to the southern conference – in part due to the encouragement of CJC vice-chair Paul Walman of Kitchener.

"We loved the weekend and would like to hold one in our community," she said. "We enjoyed talking to other parents about mutual concerns such as the interdating problem, participating in the programs organized by CJC staff, mixing with members of the local and St. Catharines communities, and enjoying time in another shul.

"We came to realize every community has concerns," Gamble said. "We are always overwhelmed by our own problems. We get a perspective in getting together with other Jews living under similar circumstances."

Groundbreaking held for Edmonton Orthodox shul

EDMONTON — Over 300 people participated in the official sod turning ceremonies for the new Beth Israel Synagogue.

This is the third home for the city's original Orthodox synagogue, which was founded in 1906.

After nearly 40 years in the first building, which was opened in 1912 on 95th Street, the congregation moved west to 119th Street.

As the Jewish community continues to move to the west end, the congregation is building a $2 million synagogue on 170th street, two km south of West Edmonton Mall.

Synagogue president Howard Starkman and Joseph Shoctor, building chair, paid tribute to William Lutsky, who arranged for the land purchase and donated money to the synagogue. The sanctuary will be dedicated in the names of his parents.

The new synagogue will have seating for 500 in theatre style seats, and room for 300 extra seats for the High Holy Days. There will also be a social hall with seating for 500.

Other features include a mikvah, offices, two kitchens and classrooms.

Among those in attendance were Reform MP Ian McClelland, and Anne McLellan, minister of justice and attorney general.

Synagogue officials expect that the synagogue will be open in time for Chanukah.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

A certain member of Parliament well known to your humble scribe has just enrolled in an intensive weight loss program. Although never thin, this particular MP gradually (but steadily) put on weight during her years on the Hill and suddenly realized one of the grim consequences of her crazy lifestyle.

In fact, politicians now are beginning to confront the toll parliamentary service is exacting on them personally, professionally and financially. Their conclusion: public service comes at a very heavy price!

While the House is in session, a typical MP is away from his or her family for at least half of each week. Relocating one's family to Ottawa doesn't really help, since the MP is obliged to return to the riding constantly. Even the best of relationships is tested under such conditions.

Add to this the stress on one's family life: children who must accept a parent's absence from important milestones such as a school play missed, a birthday party deferred, a little league hockey game minus the sideline cheerleader, or a good-night kiss transmitted digitally through the airwaves as the MP rushes to another committee meeting or late-night vote in the House.

An elected official's health is also a frequent casualty of public life.

Most MPs routinely log 18-hour workdays. Meals are inhaled on the run, and exercise is usually limited to mad dashes from the House to a meeting to the airport to another meeting. When in the riding, a typical MP will attend countless community functions and deal with a myriad of constituents' demands and needs.

However, you will say, they have freely chosen this career and the lifestyle that goes with it. True enough. At the end of the day, everyone is responsible for his or her own actions, decisions and choices.

But if excessive empathy for their work conditions is not called for, neither is the cynical derision which so often characterizes public perceptions of the 301 men and women who serve in the House of Commons, subject to the whims of a fickle and increasingly volatile electorate.

Instead, perhaps we can set aside the cynicism for a brief moment this summer and "call-in" a spontaneous thank-you to MPs for their efforts on our behalf. It would be a nice thing to do; it would be the right thing to do.

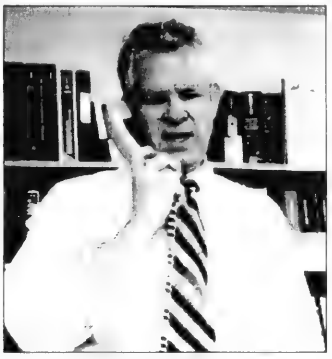
South African Jews make mark on community

By JERRY GLADMAN
Special to The CJN

In the early days of Jewish migration from South Africa to Toronto, the isolated newcomers had a tough go of it, but none more so than Rochelle Carrady.

When the Capetown native arrived here on a visit with her mother in 1950, there were no South African Jewish welcome wagons to greet them. There were no organizations, shuls or enclaves of landsmen already settled here. There were no businesses offering work, nor any kind of infrastructure to accommodate new arrivals.

In fact, says Carrady, who was forced to remain here when her mother was hospitalized with tuberculosis for two years, there were no South African Jews at all.



Alan Sandler

"I'm certain we were the very first to move here," says Carrady, who had to build a new life from the ground up.

"We really struggled. We had a lovely apartment in Capetown, but I had to live in rooming houses here. I was 15 and all alone. The Jews living here were not very friendly, and it was several years before I began to get 'hello' phone calls from other South Africans looking to settle here."

Her situation was a far cry from the thriving South African community that now exists in the Greater Toronto Area – both as a community within a community, and as comfortably integrated members of the larger Jewish society.

South African Jews – believed to be some 20,000 strong now – are involved in every sphere of Toronto life. They have their own neighborhoods, primarily in the Thornhill area, and their own shuls.

They chair UJA campaigns, sit on various boards, are principals of schools and presidents of shuls, and hold senior positions in a wide array of business and industry.

Some continue to cling to their South African roots and traditions, fighting to keep their own unique communities intact. Others, whose children are growing up in this country, have assimilated easily into the larger Jewish community. And some have even carved out lifestyles totally removed from the more established sectors.

"But whichever way you look at it, their impact on Toronto has been a very positive one," says Carrady, who helped found the Reena Foundation, when her daughter became brain damaged following a serious illness.

The initial building blocks for Toronto's South African community were actually put in place in the early '60s following the Sharpville riots and the accompanying racial unrest, which many South Africans viewed as a harbinger of dark days ahead. They began to seek out foreign shores to establish safer lifestyles for their families.

"There was no overt anti-Semitism at the time, but some people believed when they were finished with the blacks, they would start on the Jews," recalls Sandy Rabinowitz, principal of general studies at the Kamin Centre branch of Associated Hebrew Schools, who came here with his young family in 1976.

"But there were big changes taking place in South Africa, and many people began to see the writing on the wall," Rabinowitz said.

Among that group were Len and Nancy Rubenstein, who left for Canada in 1961 with their four school-aged children, and were part of the first small group to settle in Toronto.

Sandy Rabinowitz

"People thought we were crazy for leaving," says Rubenstein, who worked as a salesman, a book-keeper and a private investigator to support his family in the early days. "But maybe we had a little foresight of what was to come in South Africa."

There were actually three migrations – the early '60s, the late '70s, when the riots intensified in the townships, and the '80s, fueled by a severe economic downturn in the country. Some left for personal reasons, some for political ones, and others simply believed the country wouldn't survive the racial disharmony.

Many South Africans went to Israel, while others chose Australia for its climate and similar lifestyle. The largest number went to Britain, and the rest to North America. Those who visited Toronto en route elsewhere, liked what they saw – decent opportunities and a large Jewish support system – and decided to settle here.

"But it was still hard for us, and there was very little help," says Rubenstein, who with his wife Nancy, founded a senior's chapter of the South African Jewish Association of Canada (SAJAC).

"There were no organizations for South Africans. Many people didn't know which way to go, so we helped each other."

Early arrivals began congregating in the Bathurst and Lawrence area. When more came, they settled in enclaves at Bayview and York Mills, and Sheppard and Leslie. Eventually they moved north to Thornhill, Richmond Hill and even Markham.

For many, their lifestyle here was quite different than that in South Africa. They left behind large homes with swimming pools and servants, and flourishing businesses.

Restricted as to how much money they could take out of the country, most had to start fresh.

"The early ones really didn't focus much on community involvement," says Rabinowitz. "They saw their initial task as establishing roots and some sense of security for their families. Those who followed in later years became more involved."

Rubenstein said many tried to stay together and hold on to their past. "I decided to leave my background behind. I felt the only way to make progress was to learn the Canadian way of life. I see myself as a Canadian with South African roots."

The early immigrants quickly established an infrastructure of sorts to assist those who followed them, particularly the '70s wave.

"A lot of people we knew were leaving then," says Rabinowitz. "When we arrived, the community here was like a little kibbutz. You found people you knew from home. That was a big support group."

But accountant Alan Sandler, incoming president of UJA Federation, says the group he arrived with in 1976 was determined to join the larger Jewish community rather than established South African strongholds.

The Sandlers were actually en route to England when they visited Toronto, and met other families from home who were were quite happy here. "There was no big gap from the way it was at home, and we found Toronto very comfortable."

But still, they struggled. They had no idea how to get organized, how to find housing and jobs, drivers' licences or OHIP cards.

Also, Jewish services weren't geared to South African immigration. "We needed some basic facts, so Hilly Cohen, the late Ronnie Roth and I, decided to create an organization that would assist South Africans. The first phase was to help people deal with the system upon arrival. The other thing was to help find employment for them."

Len & Nancy Rubenstein

But Sandler insists there is no South African Jewish community per se. "There are still small pockets and enclaves – and there always will be – but most people have assimilated."

Others disagree. "Alan has been here for 23 years and has integrated superbly," says Colin Baskind, who arrived with the late '80s group, and now serves as SAJAC president.

"But the South African community exists. The majority still have mostly South African friends. Many of their relatives have joined them. There is still that old home mentality with a lot of people, and they stick together."

There are three shuls with large South African congregations – Kehillat Shaarei Torah on Bayview, Chabad Lubavitch on Green Lane and Shaar Shalom on Simonston Blvd.

Rochelle Carrady

Some assimilation was inevitable, largely because of children being brought up here. Many attended public schools rather than Jewish day schools, and made friends with non-South Africans. Because of this, their parents' circle of friends began to extend into the larger Jewish community and beyond.

"There is no reason now to identify my kids as South Africans," says Sandler. "They have no accents or South African ties other than us. They see themselves as Canadians. Many marry non-South Africans. I believe the next generation will be completely assimilated."

Now, there is a solid infrastructure for recent immigrants to feed into. Many have families and friends established here, which is an automatic way to find housing, schooling and jobs. Much is done in advance of their arrival.

The SAJAC magazine published twice yearly, features community news, household tips, a yellow pages section, and an employment program.

At the same time, many South Africans are also involved in all spheres of Jewish life outside their core group, and have made great strides in the business world.

While fewer families have members in the home country, most still cherish their roots, and long for some of what they left behind. That nostalgia is primarily what led to a successful import business for Stanley Dick of Stanmar International.

"Soon after I came here in 1981, I noted that there was a lot of visiting back and forth, and it was traditional for people to arrive with suitcases full of South African products unavailable here."

So he started importing items such as biscuits, chocolates, sauces and canned goods. "We also have products – like our Ceres fruit juices – that are in the mainstream marketplace, and geared to everyone."

There's little question that South Africans have made a significant impact on the Jewish community. Call any Jewish organization and you will bump into someone from Johannesburg or Capetown.

And while old-timers concede their world is changing and some sort of assimilation is unavoidable, they also realize that much of what they brought with them has made a tremendous contribution to their new world.

"We will never forget what we had in South Africa," says Rubenstein. "But we're very happy here. We've established a lovely life and so have our children. My son who is 52 now, recently said to me: 'Thanks, dad. Thank you for coming here.'"

He nods and smiles. "I think that says a lot."

'Very significant signals' from Damascus

Syria may drop support for Hezbollah

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Syrian President Hafez Assad may be preparing to abandon his support for the Shi'ite Hezbollah movement in Lebanon, just as he abandoned Kurdish separatist leader Abdullah Ocalan, according to the editor of a leading London-based Arabic daily.

Writing in al-Quds al-Arabi last week, Abdelbari Atwan said Assad's failure to condemn the airstrikes Israel launched on Beirut two weeks ago, and his public flirtation with Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak, reflect "internal political travails" that have produced diplomatic paralysis in Damascus.

It is difficult, Atwan wrote, to understand Syria's response to the Israeli airstrikes – or its "premature" courting of Barak, as reflected in a recent interview with British journalist Patrick Seale, in which Assad described the new Israeli premier as "strong and honest."

Commenting on Assad's possible thinking, Atwan wrote, "Over the past 30 years, we have been accustomed to Syria being more meticulous and cautious in formulating definitive positions in times of crises.

"It is noteworthy," he continued, "that while Lebanese Prime Minister Selim Hoss held Barak fully responsible for the aggression, the Syrian government was exculpating him.

"It might be no exaggeration to say that Hezbollah will meet more or less the same fate as Ocalan," he added.

Ocalan, who led the neo-Marxist Kurdish Workers party in a protracted war of secession against Turkey, was ordered to leave his safe haven in Damascus last October, after Turkey threatened military action against Syria.

He was eventually captured by a Turkish commando team in Kenya and flown back to Turkey, where he was sentenced to death.

"The question is whether the Syrian government is suffering from fatigue and has therefore decided to drop its steadfast positions in order to enter into peace agreements with Israel, which would enable it to recover lost territory and concentrate on building the homefront."

Such questions, Atwan wrote, are prompted by the "very significant signals" emerging from Damascus, such as its refusal to participate in a proposed five-way Arab summit to discuss peace moves in the wake of Barak's election; its ambivalence toward Iraq; its lukewarm attitude to other Arab countries; and its willingness to negotiate with Israel via media and business channels.

"Syrian diplomacy is paralyzed," Atwan wrote, "otherwise, it would not have relied on British journalist Patrick Seale to carry complimentary messages to Barak, which no Arab leader has had the privilege of receiving" from Damascus.

Syria is currently going through "difficult internal travails," as Assad seeks to settle the succession in favor of his son, Bashar.

"This issue is taking precedence over all others, and determines – perhaps explains – all other Syrian moves," wrote Atwan, citing dismissals from the armed forces, the postponement of the appointment of ambassadors and the attempt to complete the peace process as quickly as possible.

A "new Syria" is in the making, he wrote, adding, "It is too early to pass final judgment or to predict whether the change will be for the better or the worse because Syria's makeup, standing and location make it different from any other Arab state.

"All that can be said, is that the Israeli blitz on Beirut ushers in a new era in Lebanon and Syria, one in which there might be no room for the Islamic Resistance, or any other resistance."

Arafat slammed for holding too much power

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — An independent, American-European report has taken Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat to task, advising him to govern more democratically and effectively, or risk losing Palestinian public support.

The report, Strengthening Palestinian Public Institutions, was presented to Arafat last week in the West Bank town of Ramallah, culminating a year-long study by a task force chaired by former French prime minister Michel Rocard that included five former heads of state and world leaders.

Members of the task force highlighted some of the conclusions of the Council of Foreign Relations-sponsored report at a news conference in the West Bank town. While praising the Palestinian Authority for its achievements so far, the task force said much more must be done to build a more participatory political system and develop a free market economy.

Arafat has previously been criticized for holding too much power, while failing to impose accountability for officials and security forces.

His self-rule government has also been criticized for insufficient accountability in the spending of economic assistance funds.

The report, project director Henry Siegman said, was intended to prod Arafat to establish more democratic institutions.

"We have made it clear that not to reform is not an option," Siegman said at the news conference.

Among the measures the report called on the Palestinian Authority to implement:

- Adopt a constitution;
- Establish accountability for the executive branch of the legislature;
- Centralize public revenues and expenditures in the Finance Ministry;
- Ensure independence of the judiciary;
- Establish a civilian-controlled police force that would be subject to political, legal and financial oversight by the Palestinian Legislative Council.

The report praised the Palestinian Authority's achievements during the past five years, including the establishment of the self-rule government's Cabinet, the providing of basic services to the population and the maintenance of public order.

But at the same time, the report cited opinion polls that show Palestinian "dissatisfaction with the level of public services, a perception of waste and corruption in the public administration and police, and a loss of faith in the institutions of governance, particularly the Palestinian Legislative Council and the judiciary."

According to the report, Arafat's failure to bolster confidence through reforms could cost the Palestinian Authority public backing, while increasing support for groups opposed to the Oslo accords.

This possibility, the report said, would hamper the Palestinian Authority's ability to negotiate with Israel and harm Israeli confidence that Arafat could secure Palestinian support for any future agreements.

The Palestinian Authority said it welcomed the report. Nabil Sha'ath, the official in charge of planning affairs, said he would head a team to work with the task force on implementing the reforms.

He said many of them would help the Palestinian Authority "be ready for the declaration of our independent state."

Swiss banks seek fund beneficiaries

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Ten months after Swiss banks agreed to pay $1.25 billion to settle Holocaust-era claims, potential beneficiaries are beginning to stake their claims for compensation.

Holocaust survivors around the world began responding last week to a media campaign designed to notify hundreds of thousands of possible claimants about how to apply for payments from the settlement.

Full-page ads appeared in some 500 newspapers in 40 countries, providing an application form and a toll free number for people to call for information. Jewish organizations are also planning to send out claims packages to as many as 400,000 survivors.

The notification process began as officials convened in Washington last week to continue the search for looted assets that made their way to the United States.

A 20-member presidential commission, chaired by World Jewish Congress president Edgar Bronfman, is searching for gold, art, cultural property and other assets that were turned over to state governments following World War II.

The commission unveiled a map of all World War II-era federal agencies that might have possessed or controlled assets of Holocaust victims, providing a blueprint for the investigative work that lies ahead.

House and Senate lawmakers sitting on the commission announced legislation to extend the commission's mandate for another year, making a final report to the president due at the end of next year.

Payments from the Swiss fund, meanwhile, are not expected to start reaching Holocaust survivors until the second half of next year, although Jewish officials and lawyers involved in the settlement are urging Swiss banks to immediately start making interim payments to elderly survivors.

Unlike a humanitarian fund of nearly $200 million set up by Switzerland in 1997 that has provided payments to needy Holocaust survivors, the $1.25-billion settlement is intended as restitution for those who lost assets in the Holocaust.

Eligible recipients include:

• Survivors who deposited assets in Swiss banks or have claims to any looted assets that made their way to Switzerland;

• Slave laborers exploited by Swiss entities; and

• Refugees who sought entry into Switzerland to avoid Nazi persecution and were mistreated.

There are no estimates yet as to how many people will be eligible and how large the payments might be.

No final deadline has been set for applications under the fund, the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) said.

Oct. 22 has been set as a date for claimants to register their suggestions for allocation.

But claimants will be able to apply until a date which has not yet been set, said Ron Singer, spokesperson for the CJC Ottawa Advocacy Centre.

For information, Canadian applicants can call a hot line at 1-888-635-5483, or access the Web site at www.swissbankclaims.com. The Web site also includes an application form.

The fund is the same one approved about 18 months ago, and payouts still have to be approved by a U.S. District Court on Nov. 29, 1999, Singer said.

Those payouts will likely be made before the end of 2000.

Barak forges governing coalition

• Housing Ministry – National Religious Party. This will help the NRP advance its interests in developing Jewish settlements, but could prove to be a source of tension with dovish parties within the coalition. It may also present difficulties in peace negotiations with the Palestinians, who have demanded an end to Jewish settlement activity.

• Interior Ministry – Yisrael b'Aliyah. The Russian immigrants' party built its campaign around the demand to wrest control of the ministry from Shas, which Yisrael b'Aliyah charged was blocking the entry of immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

• Immigrant Absorption – Yisrael b'Aliyah will continue to control this ministry.

Early this week Ha'aretz reported that Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak has decided to give the Finance Ministry to former finance minister Avraham "Beiga" Shochat; the Internal Security Ministry will go to Shlomo Ben Ami. Yossi Beilin has been offered the Justice Ministry.

Binyamin Ben Eliezer has been offered the Communications Ministry, though he may receive the Internal Security Ministry instead if Ben Ami decides to forgo it.

Shalom Simchon is Barak's candidate for Knesset speaker, and David Levy will serve his third term as foreign minister this decade. Leaving Barak's office, Levy said he and Barak would run foreign policy jointly and shrugged off the appointment of Shimon Peres as minister of regional development.

Sources close to Barak said he sees the Regional Development Ministry as kind of a "headquarters" responsible for drafting position papers, ideas and suggestions for advancing various fronts of the peace process.

Jews wounded in drive-by shootings

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

CHICAGO — The dark side of America was revealed once again, a major activist in a Jewish organization said last weekend, after a series of drive-by shootings in and around Chicago left a black man dead and six Jews wounded.

"The permanent undercurrent of racism, insane violence and hatred of others came up to the surface," the source said, claiming that the events again prove that there are groups and persons in the United States that will do anything to hurt Jews and persecute them.

The man suspected in the two-day shooting spree shot and killed himself Sunday night after police pursued him in south Illinois.

Benjamin Michael Smith, 21, was believed to be a white supremacist.

The Week in Israel

June 28

• Syria agreed to a visit next month by a group of Jewish and Arab mayors from Israel. The visit, which would be the first official trip to Damascus by Israeli Jews, is being co-ordinated through a European mediator.

June 29

• Close to 100 Jews from Kuwara region in Ethiopia arrived in Israel on Tuesday as part of stepped-up efforts to bring in the more than 3,000 Jews still living there.

June 30

• Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak sent a letter to the Knesset officially advising the legislature that he would present his new government next week.

• The president of Turkey announced that he expects to visit Israel and the Palestinian Authority this month and thus become the first foreign leader to meet with Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak.

July 1

• An Israeli air navigator who was taken captive in Lebanon 13 years ago may no longer be alive, according to a former commander of the Israel air force. But Maj. Gen. Avihu Bin Nun said that his comments regarding navigator Ron Arad were based solely on the fact that so many years have passed without any evidence that Arad is alive.

July 2

• A spokesperson for Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak implicitly criticized President Bill Clinton for saying at a press conference with Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak: "I would like it if the Palestinian people felt free and were free to live wherever they like, wherever they want to. live." Merav Parsi-Tsadok said that the president's "stance on the right of return, as it might be understood...is unacceptable to Barak."

• According to the IDF's judge advocate-general, Uri Shoham, soldiers in the IDF's Lebanon Liaison Unit are collaborating with militiamen of the South Lebanon Army to smuggle drugs, arms and other items into Israel.

Eighteen Canadian university presidents visit Israel

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — "Spectacular," said Terrence H. White, president of the University of Calgary, after being asked what he thought about Israel.

White, here for the first time, was one of 18 Canadian university presidents taking part in last week's study visit to Israel sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

The visit, a first for many of the presidents and their spouses, was the brainchild of former CJC president, Irving Abella.

"The purpose of this trip is to enhance the relationship between Canadian and Israeli universities," said Abella, who led the first group of university presidents on a similar trip five years ago. "[We want to] encourage exchange programs for students and professors."

Most of the universities represented on this trip do not have exchanges with Israel. However, after eight days of travelling through the country and visiting the universities here, many of the presidents expressed interest in establishing such programs – exactly what Abella wanted.

Halifax's Mount Saint Vincent University president Sheila A. Brown said one of the reasons for her taking part in this trip was to look into the possibility of an exchange program in gender studies with the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. After a visit to the Hebrew University, Brown said the possibilities looked good.

Colin Starnes, president of the University of King's College, also in Halifax, expressed interest in providing exchanges between Israeli universities and his university. King's College has seen its Jewish student population skyrocket in recent years. Starnes, who said he was overwhelmed by his Israel experience, said he would like to promote a student exchange program with the Hebrew University's Rothberg International School. More than 4,000 students study at the Rothberg one-year program; of some 60 Canadian students who took part in the 1998-99 program, one was from King's.

The schools on the trip that already have exchanges with Israeli institutions came to further their projects.

The University of Calgary has a number of exchange programs between professors and students, White said, but added that he would like to formalize some new relationships. He said his university already has joint research projects with the Hebrew University in biotechnology, genetics and Canadian studies, but he was asked by his colleagues to look into engineering projects with the Technion in Haifa.

"I want to explore further opportunities with Israeli universities – which are excellent," said Concordia University's president, Frederick Lowy, whose university currently has exchanges with the Technion in the area of building studies and with Ben-Gurion University of the Negev in humanities.

Lowy said there used to be an exchange with Hebrew University, which he now plans on reviving.

"Israeli universities are new and more creative. Canadians can learn from them," Abella said in explaining why he chose to bring the Canadian university presidents to Israel. "All Israeli universities are far ahead [and they can] open possibilities to Canadians."

Dalhousie University's Tom Traves agreed. "There's a very impressive university system here," he said. He would like to formalize the informal professor and student swaps his university now has with Israeli institutions.

"As a result of the last trip, there's been exponential growth in exchange programs," said Abella.

"My goal is to help Israeli universities. Any exchange programs Israel brings to Canada and vice versa would be helpful. I want to help both countries in their goals and aspirations," said Abella.

Although only here for eight days, the group, which also included the Council of Ontario Universities and CJC staff, trekked all over the country. They visited Jerusalem, Masada, the Dead Sea, Ein Gedi, Tel Aviv, Haifa and the Golan.

Abella said he was thrilled by the number of university presidents who came on the trip. "I thought 10 or 12 universities would come, not 20!"

Other universities that took part in this trip were Brock, McMaster, Nipissing, Queen's, St. Francis Xavier, Wilfrid Laurier, Ryerson Polytechnic University, and the universities of Guelph, Manitoba, Regina, Windsor and Winnipeg.

In addition to being organized by the CJC, the trip was funded by private donors, including Gerald Schwartz of Onex, Charles Bronfman, Gluskin and Sheff, Edward Bronfman and Milton Harris.

Abella, who is chair of the Canadian committee for enhancement of higher education in the Galilee added that since the last trip five years ago, Jewish programs at Canadian universities have expanded widely. He said he hoped this trip would achieve the same thing.

Syria deal could free MIAs

effectiveness in securing the prisoners' releases.

"I don't think we're doing anything special," Baumel said. "The American mentality is not to be overly dependent on governments."

The Baumels have met with Arab interlocutors and they have even tried backchannel, cloak and dagger approaches they hoped would reveal more information about the MIAs. French President Jacques Chirac has raised the issue during a visit to Lebanon.

Although the PLO pledged in 1993 to provide information about the MIAs, and Arafat presented half of Baumel's dogtag to Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, the Palestinian leader has failed to provide further information.

Since the election of Ehud Barak as prime minister, prospects for the release of the prisoners has increased, Baumel believes, though he's not willing to wager his emotional well-being on that one chance.

"On the one hand, if we weren't optimistic, we wouldn't be able to do what we do. On the other hand, we've been disappointed before. We'll believe it when we see it," he said.

Barak has indicated his desire to complete a deal with Syria on Lebanon and the Golan Heights, and that opens the door to a deal that would include the MIAs, Baumel said.

"The dynamics are there for an initiative by all related parties that could be beneficial."

Baumel, who was in Canada last week accompanied by Dan Eisen, chair of the International Coalition for Missing Israeli Soldiers, believes Canada could play a key role in securing the MIAs' freedom.

"Canada has good relations with the Arab world," he said. "They can do much more for us than allies of Israel [the United States.]"

"Canada is wise enough to see the opportunity for striking a positive blow in the Middle East," Eisen added. "The resolution of this would be a winner for all. It would have an enormous impact on Israel. It would allow the Arabs to fulfil their international obligations and it would allow Canada to fulfil its role as an honest broker."

Baumel and Eisen believe they must lay the political groundwork in Canada before approaching government officials to seek their assistance.

Natives of the United States, the Baumels moved to Israel from Brooklyn in 1970. Prior to that, Zachary had attended Eitz Chaim Jewish school in Boro Park and in Israel, he combined army service and yeshiva studies through the hesder program. He never gave up his U.S. citizenship.

The Baumels' situation is well known among U.S. lawmakers. A few weeks ago, the House of Representatives adopted a bill that called on the State Department to raise the matter of the Israeli MIAs "on an urgent basis with appropriate government officials of Syria, Lebanon, the Palestinian Authority..."

The bill also requires that "decisions with regard to U.S. economic and other forms of assistance...and U.S. policy...should take into consideration the willingness of these governments and authorities to assist in locating and securing the return of these soldiers."

The Bill passed by a 415-5 vote and now goes to the Senate.

In the meantime, the Baumels are looking forward to the day when Zachary will be reunited with his family.

"He has an older brother and a sister, and six nieces he's never met," his father said.

Professor warns against private health system

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — As a result of the proliferation of private medical clinics in Quebec, there are longer waits in the public health care system because doctors have a financial incentive to devote more of their time to private services, a community conference heard.

The current mixed health care system not only has a human cost, it is also more inefficient economically than a universal plan that is fully publicly funded, said McGill University economics professor, Lee Soderstrom, who has spent 25 years studying the health care field.

Doctors make more doing the same procedures in a private clinic than in a public hospital, he said. "As time permits, they see patients in the public sector," he said.

Soderstrom gave the example of cataract surgery in Manitoba. In 1996, among doctors who worked only in the public sector, their patients waited an average of 10 weeks for surgery. Among doctors who split their time between public hospitals and private clinics, their private patients waited an average of 4.1 weeks, while their public hospital patients had to wait 23 weeks.

This financial incentive for doctors also leads to an overuse of health care services, he added. Doctors will suggest more tests and procedures to patients knowing they will be well remunerated for them, as has happened in the United States.

His argument, he admitted, flies in the face of that of the proponents of privatization, who claim that it will save taxpayers' money and will improve the availability of certain medical services.

Soderstrom was guest speaker at a conference entitled Medicare: Going, Going... Gone? The Threat of Privatization, organized by the council on services to seniors advocacy committee of FEDERATION CJA and the Community Coalition on Health Care of NDG. The two organizations are working together to raise public awareness of and lobby against government cutbacks to health care.

Besides clinics, privatization is creeping into the health care system in other ways, he said, for example, in home care, user fees and the provincial drug insurance plan.

Soderstrom said the evidence shows that for-profit firms are no more efficient than non-profit ones. "Studies over 25 years in the United States of for-profit and non-profit hospitals show no significant difference in costs...except to patients, because for-profit hospitals often charge more for services."

The evidence demonstrates that administrative costs of health care are, in fact, substantially lower under a universal public financing, he said. Private insurance companies have a high overhead for marketing, premium collection and claim payments.

"The administrative costs in Canada for health care are $100 to $125 per capita. In the United States, it's over $400 per person," he said.

Another speaker, Claude Saint-Georges, a researcher for the Confédération des Syndicats Nationaux, noted that Quebec's per capita spending on health care is now the lowest of all the provinces and territories. It dropped from $1,734 in 1994 to $1,655 in 1998, he said.

"During that same period, private spending per capita went up from $634 to $719."

Spending increases

Public health institutions, such as hospitals, long-term care facilities and CLSCs, saw their total financing reduced by $537 million between 1993 and 1998, he said. "During that period, payments to doctors went up by $78 million, and global spending for drugs was raised by $382 million."

The number of hospital beds in the province decreased to 16,389 in 1998 from 23,012 beds in 1994, a 28.7 percent drop, he said. The number of long-term beds also went down by 8.4 percent.

Over 200 people, most of them seniors, attended the conference. An action plan was adopted to press the provincial and federal governments to reverse what they see as a trend toward privatization of health care.

Reva Gesser, a community activist for 48 years and a founder of the Golden Age Association, reminded participants how difficult things were for those without money before medicare.

"Those who are too young to remember, don't be smug and say what's a small fee? Let's not return to those dark days," Gesser said.

A conference plenary adopted the recommendation that "our discourse as community organizations be redefined to focus on the needs of people versus the cost of services. We have been manipulated into adopting the government's discourse."

Postcards to MNAs and MPs against privatization were distributed for participants to mail in. Participants were also urged to target doctors, and "make them feel their social responsibilities."

Tenor brings down the house at annual Yiddish concert

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With Yiddish lyrics to Embraceable You, tenor Michael Smolash, 27, a relative newcomer from Montreal, wowed 2,000 attending the 29th annual concert of Yiddish music.

Singing and dancing with members of the audience, his flair for showbiz strongly evident, young Smolash was a hit with his combination of traditional Yiddish folksongs and popular Broadway melodies. The melodies were translated into Yiddish by Henia Reinhartz and Hindy Abelson.

Smolash brought the house down when he put on a skirt, a blouse, a sweater, three aprons and a scarf over his head to sing what he described as a sequel to Di Grine Kuzine.

It was the lament, he said, of the unlucky immigrant a year after she was wed. Actually, it was the traditional folk song, A Yor Nokh Der Khasene with words by Isaac Reingold.

As he took off his feminine garments Smolash introduced members of the klezmorim who accompanied him, Brian Katz, Anne Lederman, Sasha Luminsky, Artie Roth and Martin van de Ven.

The klezmorim distinguished themselves with a jazzed-up version of Der Nayer Sher.

Smolash's contribution supplemented the more traditional part of the program by the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir conducted by Esther Ghan Firestone, accompanied by Lina Zemelman.

The choir sang Yiddish Iz Mayn Lied and excerpts from the Yiddish folk operetta Der Bobe's Cholem with soloists Roz Keyes, Miriam Eskin and Benjamin Stein.

The concert was held in the main sanctuary at Beth Tzedec Congregation, instead of in Earl Bales Park, because inclement weather forced the concert indoors at the last moment. The audience at the synagogue was about the same size as it has been at the park.

The large crowd was seen as evidence that Yiddish is alive and well, said Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl.

"Jewish life is founded upon singing," he said. "God commands people of Israel to sing. The Talmud should be sung not just spoken. Our community gave birth to the Yiddish lied."

All Jewish groups should celebrate 1,000 years of Yiddish next year, said Ethel Cooper, chair, UJA Federation's Yiddish committee. She was also concert co-chair with committee member, David Abramowitz.

Noting that the comittee's expenses run to several thousand dollars a year, she asked the Jewish community to "throw its support behind Yiddish before it is too late."

"The city of Toronto will continue to support this Yiddish concert," said Councillor Howard Moscoe, bringing greetings from Mayor Mel Lastman. Eda Zimler Schiff, president of the Friends of Yiddish, also spoke.

Waltonsteins traces woman's roots

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TVOntario is broadcasting two vivid documentaries later this month on Studio 2 bound to appeal to Jewish viewers.

The first, Waltonsteins, is about a woman's search for her Jewish ancestry. The second, Ruth and Frank, is a portrait of the Canadian composer who wrote crooner Frank Sinatra's first hit song. Both shows air at 8 p.m.

Imagine discovering you're not who you think you are.

Tell me about it, says Frannie Sheridan, an Ottawa playwright who stumbled upon her Jewishness.

The Waltonsteins, to be aired on Tuesday, July 13, is a portrait of a feisty woman who discovers her ancestral roots.

Sheridan's father, a Holocaust survivor whose wife bore him seven children, converted to Roman Catholicism when Sheridan was a child. Having been persecuted as a Jew, he abandoned Judaism.

In Ottawa, he joined a local church, St. Basil's, and attended services religiously. Sheridan and her siblings were baptized and confirmed at St. Basil's.

When she was nine, Sheridan found out the truth about herself. Her father urged her never to reveal the secret. He was tortured by an obsessive fear that harm would come to his children if they revealed themselves as Jews.

According to Sheridan, her mother did not share her husband's obsession with concealing his Jewish background. Indeed, she was reluctant to hide her Jewishness, and the issue divided the family.

Frannie Sheridan

In short, sharp bursts, Sheridan acts out the emotions which tore her family apart.

Interestingly enough, the pastor of St. Basil's, Father Corbin Eddy, decries the fact that, in a free, multinational country like Canada, Sheridan's father felt the need to reject and deny his origins.

The story has a "happy" ending, so to speak.

On Thursday, July 15, Ruth Lowe is showcased. She is famous for having composed the seductive I'll Never Smile Again.

A Toronto pianist, she wrote the winning number in 10 minutes while living in Chicago. It was a tribute to her beloved husband, who died during a fairly routine surgical procedure.

As Tom Sandler – her son – relates, Lowe gave the song to band leader Tommy Dorsey, who in turn passed it on to Sinatra, then an up-and-coming star.

It launched his career and Lowe's friendship, such as it was, with Sinatra.

Lowe wrote one more song for Sinatra, Put Your Dreams Away For Another Day, and it became his theme song.

In closing, Sandler explains that his mother stopped writing songs because she wanted to have "a normal life."

I don't quite understand what he means, but isn't it a pity she did not develop her talents any further?

RARE HEBRAICA ON DISPLAY AT U OF T

Several important Judaic works are included as part of an exhibition of relatively recent acquisitions of the University of Toronto's Thomas Fisher Rare Book Library, situated beside the Robarts Library on St. George Street, south of Bloor.

The exhibition includes rare books in a wide range of categories, including Hebraica, Science and Medicine, Exploration and Travel, Italian and Caribbean works, English and American Literature, and Canadiana.

The Hebraic works are listed at the front of the glossy 72-page catalogue because they are the oldest. They include eight manuscripts and printed books, the earliest of which may date from the ninth century CE.

Scholars are still divided over whether the Mishnah fragment that Toronto financier Albert Friedberg and his wife Nancy Friedberg gave to the university in 1995 dates from the ninth or the 11th century. If, as some insist, the vellum manuscript page originated in the middle of the ninth century, it is one of the oldest Hebrew texts extant.

Other items donated by the Friedbergs include Halachot Pesukot (Decided Laws) by Yehudai ben Nahman, a 10th century manuscript of the first known work of the Geonim, the scholars of Babylonia.

There is also a complete Hebrew Bible originating in Toledo in 1307; a copy of a 14th-century work, Sefer Mitzvot Gadol, by French Rabbi Moses ben Jacob of Coucy; and an exceedingly rare early manuscript of the Zohar, which may have belonged to the 17th-century messianic pretender Shabbetai Tsevi.

The printed books seem no less intriguing. Sefer Hasidim is an ethical treatise by Judah ben Samuel, dating from the Middle Ages and printed in 1538. It was donated from the estate of Rabbi Abraham Price, who decades ago wrote an extensive commentary on the work.

Also on display are a 1593-era edition of Sefer ha-Kuzari, by Yehudah ha-Levi, an important philosophic work concerning the Khazar people who converted to Judaism in the eighth century, and an illustrated Hebrew edition of the Song of Solomon, printed about 1922 in Berlin. Both were acquired in 1997 through the Freda and Patrick Hart Green Fund.

The eclectic exhibition also includes published works by Dante, Galileo, Jane Austen, Henry James and Ernest Hemingway, among many others, and the papers of various Canadian authors including Gwendolyn MacEwen who wrote Earth and High Heaven (1947), which gave an early treatment of a Jewish theme in Canadian literature. The exhibition continues to Sept. 3.

• Congratulations to Jeremy Gladstone and the Toronto band The Zygotes upon the release of their first CD, Turning Gyge's Ring. The CD was launched at a big bash recently at The Rivoli on Queen Street W.

• The 11th annual Beaches International Jazz Festival runs July 22 to 25. The shindig involves a two-kilometer-long street fest and the sounds of more than 40 bands.

• The Art of Etching, featuring artists S. Firer, A. Arma, N. Engel, L. Hunt and more, continues at Klim Art Gallery, 2473 Yonge St. above Eglinton, thru July 11.

Eclectic Journal: The latest issue of Ariel: The Israel Review of Arts and Letters, focuses on some aspects of the relationship between Israel and the Christian world in acknowledgement of the approaching Christian millennium. The 96-page journal provides an unusual mix of theology, geology, photography and poetry, as well as pieces on dance, film and literature.

Its review of Journey to My Father, Israel Zamir's memoir of his famous father, Isaac Bashevis Singer, is interesting, even if it does appear almost five years after the book came to print.

Equally interesting is Hillel Tryster's piece on silent films in Palestine. Tryster is deputy director of the Steven Spielberg Jewish Film Archive at the Hebrew University, Jerusalem.

Artist creates directory of synagogue artists

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Canadian textile artist Temma Gentles, says she is dismayed with how often Canadian congregations ignore Canadian artists, and seek out American artists or items from New York Judaica stores.

"It isn't because the American work is better or less expensive," she says, "only that congregations don't know where to find experienced Canadian artists. They are also reluctant to engage in the commission process."

Gentles believes that a directory of Canadian synagogue artists could rectify the situation. She approached Rabbi Paul Golomb, director of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ), and offered to assemble a directory of artists of religious works, if CCRJ would pay

NAPOLEON & OTHER DIVERSIONS IN MONTREAL

The intriguing collection of artifacts related to the French Emperor Napoleon, on view at the Stewart Museum on St. Helene's Island in Montreal, constitute an effective remembrance to a towering historical figure.

He was a military genius and strategist par excellence who had luck and timing with him. At the height of his conquests, he reigned over 40 percent of the European population. "From nothing, I rose to the rank of the most powerful monarch of the world," was how he once summed up his own career. "Europe was at my feet. I confess ...my ambition was great."

And so, correspondingly, is his legend. The exhibit, which originated in Paris, consists of some 300 artifacts, works and documents, including his birth cradle, furniture, clothing, wedding ring, the sabre he used for the campaign of Egypt, and his trademark two-pointed hat.

The exhibit makes no allusions to Napoleon's relations with the Jews, although that peripheral subject has been the focus of books and essays. Napoleon was apparently fascinated with this legendary ancient people, and the problem of bringing them into the modern republic and applying his vision of universal civil rights to them.

He reconvened the Sanhedrin of old, and his soldiers helped to usher in the age of Jewish emancipation by "liberating" the Jews from their confining ghettos.

Like the Jewish people, Napoleon was twice in exile, first on the island of Elba from which he escaped, then on St. Helena, where he spent the last five years of his life.

I found one of the most fascinating pieces in the exhibition to be a small drawing of an unassuming, pot-bellied little man, dressed in white and wearing a sunhat, sitting in the shade as though he has just been puttering in the garden. Thus, Napoleon on St. Helena.

At his death, artists rushed to his bedside to fashion a plaster cast of his face; the deathmask is also displayed. Artists depicting Napoleon posthumously sometimes did so with Christological overtones. One fanciful canvas shows him stepping triumphantly out of the grave, risen again.

Napoleon was a historical giant whose legend is still revered in many quarters. As one might expect, the exhibition treats him reverentially, even as it demonstrates that his feet, after all, were made of clay.

Until Oct. 11. Adults $10. 514-790-1245 or 800-361-4595. www.stewart-museum.org.

Montreal Beaux Arts: An ambitious new exhibition opened recently at the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts (Musee des Beaux Arts). Cosmos: From Romanticism to the Avant-Garde, shows how the vastness of the universe and the depths of its mysteries captured the imaginations of an eclectic bunch of artists, including Goya, Miro, Turner, Van Gogh, Picasso, Calder, Kandinsky, Lawren Harris and Joyce Wieland.

The search for new frontiers is a huge topic in modern history. It encompasses the 19th-century explorations of America, including the Far North, to contemporary explorations of the solar system. Cosmos shows how the modern scientific spirit of discovery informed the artistic sensibilities from 1801 to the present.

Until Oct. 17. Adults $12. 1380 Sherbrooke St. W. 800-361-4595.

This Wenzel Hablik painting is part of the Cosmos exhibition.

Museum Pass: Admission to the Musee des Beaux Arts, the Stewart Museum and 17 other institutions are included when you purchase a Montreal Museum Pass for $15 for one day or $28 for three days (adults).

Other institutions include the outstanding Pointe-a-Calliere Museum of Archaeology and History of Montreal, the Canadian Centre for Architecture, the Biosphere, the Just for Laughs Museum and the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (temporarily located in Cavendish Mall).

The Museum Pass is available at participating museums, major hotels and at the Infotouriste office in Dorchester Square. 514-845-6873 or 800-363-7777.

Directory lists artists

the costs of the initial printing and mailing.

"Rabbi Golomb agreed enthusiastically," she says. Gentles sent some 100 letters to artists and architects. Calls for submissions were posted in provincial crafts organizations across the country and in many of the single-media guilds.

"Although being Jewish was not a prerequisite, experience with commissions and willingness to work in a religious environment were." She adds that she also wanted to provide a full range of expertise to congregations including landscape design and museum curators. "All who qualified were included at no cost to themselves."

The Directory of Synagogue Artists includes a page for each of the 24 artists working in metal, stone, ceramics, wood, textile, stained glass and multi-media.

The directory also includes a photo of each artist's work, personal statements by the artists, some of their recent commissions, and contact information.

Gentles, who is one of the artists listed in the directory, says the booklet includes a guide explaining how commissions work. "I want to demystify the process. I hope this section will prove useful."

Recently, Gentles completed a dome-shaped chupah for Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, 10 Torah mantles for Congregation Beth Israel in Worcester, Mass., and she is currently completing several textile pieces for the new Village Shul on Eglinton Avenue.

She recently spoke at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem on historical and contemporary chupot.

Although the directory is aimed at synagogues, she says that recently, more and more organizations and private homes are acquiring Judaica art pieces."

Gentles hopes to bring an exhibit of the artists' work to the Internet and to regional conferences, and she plans to update the directory every two years.

For a copy of the directory, send a self-addressed envelope at least 6 x 9 inches with two Canadian first-class stamps to; CCRJ, 36 Atkinson Ave., Thornhill, Ont., L4J 8C9.

Parent has ties to her majesty's sceptered isle

Thornhill athlete to suit up for British baseball team

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ari Levstein speaks with no trace of a British accent, but when you talk to his father, Ivor, his Glaswegian brogue comes through loud and clear.

Right now, Levstein the younger is thanking his lucky stars for his family's connection to her majesty's sceptered isle. Those ties came in very handy recently when the 18-year-old athlete was asked to play for the British National Baseball Team. Levstein readily agreed to the unexpected opportunity and left recently for Britain. He will take up residence in suburban London, where he will split his games playing for the nationals and for Bracknell, a club team northwest of the city.

Levstein's summer will include a trip with the national team to Germany where they will play against other European baseball powers. That will be followed by the European Pool A Championships, with the two top teams qualifying for the Olympic Games in Sydney in 2000.

Ironically, Levstein's best opportunity to participate in the Olympics came by leaving his native land, since Canada will not be sending a baseball team to the quadrennial games.

Levstein has played elite-level baseball in the Toronto area ever since he was a kid. A five-foot-10, 165-lb. centre fielder with the Thornlea Thunder, his high school team, he also patrols the outfield for the Thornhill Reds in the Metro Toronto League.

His stats with the Thunder show why the British nationals considered him such a hot prospect. In 26 games, he racked up a .500 average with two home runs, two triples, nine doubles and 14 singles. He stole six bases and registered 20 RBIs. The year before, he hit .439, with 27 singles and 20 ribbies.

Those numbers indicate Levstein hits for average, not for power. "My goal is consistency and with that comes big hits," he said.

In 1998, the Thunder lost in the finals of the Ontario high school championships – Levstein was named MVP in the championship game – and this year the team finished fifth province-wide.

Levstein played about 20 games with the Reds this season but he didn't see much action. A torn tendon in his thumb kept him out of the lineup and hampered his hitting when he returned. He still managed a .500 average on six hits in 12 at-bats.

Levstein's resume also includes a key role on the Toronto's Maccabi Youth Games baseball team, a squad that sliced through the opposition easily en route to a gold medal in Hartford a few years ago.

His Thornlea coach, Gary Godkin, believes Levstein "has all the tools he needs," to succeed in England.

"He's one of the better players in York Region, in the top 10," he said.

"Ari is an unbelievable player with a great work ethic," he continued. "He is also one of the nicest student athletes I've had the pleasure to coach."

Ari Levstein

Last year, he pointed out, Levstein helped him bring along the team's younger players while finishing second on the team in hitting and slugging percentages.

"He was a starter, he batted second in the lineup and he was one of our clutch hitters," he said.

Levstein won't be the first Thornlea grad going to Britain to play baseball. Last year, a former teammate was recruited to play for the Brits – one of four or five Canadians on the national team – and he told the coach about Levstein. The coach e-mailed Levstein, asking for his stats, his background, some references and a video of him playing. Levstein provided the information, and later learned that a scout had come to watch him play, although "I don't know when or which game the scout was at."

In mid-May he got a call from Britain, saying "the team would be delighted if I came to play." It didn't take him long to accept the offer.

A student at Associated Hebrew Schools until grade six, Levstein started playing competitive baseball at seven years of age. He moved to rep ball at nine, playing the infield for teams in Richmond Hill, Maple and for the past seven years, Thornhill.

He admits the English invitation took him somewhat by surprise, but "I've never been happier. It's an experience I'd never thought about. It's taking baseball to another level. I figured it was the opportunity of a lifetime, so I might as well take it."

Golfers raise research funds

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Michael Nepom had a bone marrow transplant in May 1998, he might have been forgiven for staying as far away from any reminders of the situation as possible.

Instead, he and his wife Shari started the annual McKinnon Heating Cooling Golf Tournament, to raise funds for cancer research.

A committee, which includes Nepom's sister Leslie Igel, is helping organize the 1999 tournament. It will be held at the Diamondback Golf Club in Richmond Hill on July 14. Registration will be from 7 to 7:30 a.m., with a shotgun tee-off at 8:30.

The fee of $195 per golfer, includes breakfast, green fees, a power cart, and lunch.

The beneficiary of this year's tournament will be the Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation. Proceeds will be directed to the hospital's bone marrow transplant unit.

Nepom, diagnosed with chronic myeloid leukemia, received his bone marrow transplant at Princess Margaret.

Last year's tournament raised $15,000 for the Leukemia Research Foundation.

The year 1998 was special for the Nepoms, not just because of the transplant, but also because the couple's first child, daughter Jaimee, was born in September.

For more information on the second annual McKinnon Heating Cooling Golf Tournament, call 694-1187.

The Inside Back

Will Israel have a constitution?

In addition to wording the new government's approach to issues such as the peace talks with the Palestinians and Syria, the coalition negotiations in Israel revolved around solutions to questions like the draft of Yeshiva students and the recognition of non-Orthodox conversion.

You may recall that these matters came to a head due to the intervention of Israel's Supreme Court, leading to demonstrations and counter-demonstrations, as well as no small amount of discussion on the role of the court in Israel's democratic process.

In fact, one of the major areas of difference among the parties which may make up Israel's next government, is their approach to the completion of the country's written constitution. Parties such as Meretz and the Centre party ran on a platform calling for the legislation of more Basic Laws in order to finalize a bill of rights and constitution which would be above the Knesset and government, while the religious parties see the same issues as a reason to stay out of the government.

Essentially, in addition to the arguments over the content of the constitution, the factions are divided over whether the court should be granted the power to strike down legislation at all. Former Shas leader Aryeh Deri is quoted as saying that he would not even vote to enact the Ten Commandments in Israel's constitution, if the courts had the right to interpret them.

It is worth recalling the roots of the debate. At the founding of the state, the first legislators were unable to agree on a constitution, and there was no formal groundwork for citizens' rights.

Prof. Pnina Lahav writes in her biography of Supreme Court President Shimon Agranat (the North American who had more influence than any other on Israeli society), that Ben-Gurion and other founders of the state had an ambivalent attitude to the rule of law. While they wanted Israel to be part of the community of western, democratic nations, their history in the underground, where the important thing was to get things done despite the laws, and their fears about the security of the country, created an approach which saw legalities as unimportant.

Lahav quotes Agranat describing working conditions of the Supreme Court in the first years of the state, in an unheated, dank building in Jerusalem's Russian compound, where there was no library and writing paper was rationed, so that judgments were written on the backs of used forms from the days of the British Mandate. The status of the judges was commensurate with their conditions.

At the same time, the general feeling was that the victory in the War of Independence was fragile, and that any threat to government power could weaken the country. In this atmosphere, the judges did not want to confront the government, and tended to approve its actions.

Agranat's major accomplishment may have been to create out of nothing the legal framework to protect the citizen from the powers of the state. Thus, for example, he was the first to use the Declaration of Independence as a legal document, arguing and ruling that since the Declaration of Independence states that Israel was founded on democratic principles, it was clear that freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, etc. were inherent to the legal tradition, and were enforceable.

Today's Supreme Court President Aharon Barak has continued Agranat's tradition of legal activism, and perhaps even taken it too far in some cases. Nonetheless, I have no doubt that the same politicians who decry the court's intervention, are secretly glad that it exists to protect them and their constituents from the arbitrary power of the state.

As always, Israel faces vital decisions which will affect its future and its security. This decade has witnessed the turmoil such decisions can cause, sometimes leading to violence. In such an atmosphere, it may be inappropriate or even impossible to create a constitution, which should ideally be based on broad social consensus and acceptance.

The government may also take steps to overturn rulings of the court with which it disagrees. One can only hope that if such steps are taken, they will not lead to a retreat of the court from its role as guarantor of civil rights, back to the days when it served as a rubber stamp for whatever politicians decided to do.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I'm getting married in six weeks and everything is going well with the wedding. I have been disturbed about one thing however – the wedding rings.

My fiancé Marty does not want to wear one. He said if it was important to me for him to have one, he would consent to a double-ring ceremony; however, once the day is over, it comes off.

He claims he is uncomfortable wearing a ring and he is not a jewelry kind of guy.

I was very hurt by his decision, as I feel the ring is a symbol of our commitment to each other, and his not wanting to wear it makes a statement I'm not sure I'm comfortable with.

Am I reading too much into this or am I justified in wanting him to wear his ring as I will be proudly wearing mine?

Ring Around the Marriage

Dear Ring Around the Marriage

I find it interesting that you feel so strongly about Marty wearing a wedding ring.

In six weeks, he will be standing under the chupah with you and committing his life and love to you. Have you thought of why it is so important for you to have him wear a ring? Is it a matter of trust, or possibly peace of mind, knowing that anyone who meets him gets the message that he is off limits?

The symbolic custom of a man wearing a wedding ring will not change the way he treats you. If he loves and respects you, wearing a ring won't enhance or lessen that.

I think you need to take a step back and re-examine why you need Marty to wear a ring. Don't let your insecurities get in the way of having a wonderful life together. After all, it is possible that he really does just feel uncomfortable wearing jewelry. Many people are the same.

There are far more important things to gauge a man's love and trust for you, than a wedding ring.

If you truly do love and have faith in your future husband, then put his wedding ring out of your mind and enjoy your wedding day and your life together.

Mission to Israel

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — Hearing about Israel in the news is one thing. Being here is a totally different matter. At least that's what 10 Canadian parliamentarians learned after spending a week as guests of the Canadian-Israel Committee (CIC).

"I could have read a million reports and never have duplicated what I've seen...I think we will all go home with an enhanced understanding," said Sue Barnes, MP, London West.

Monte Solberg, MP, Medicine Hat, said he had only a cursory understanding of Israel's problems. "I have learned how complex the situation is with the Palestinians and with Lebanon and Syria. I think I've become more sympathetic to the plight of Jews in Israel who are so worried about their security and future."

The group was brought to Israel on an annual trip organized by the CIC, to give them an "opportunity for some exposure to the issues in the Middle East," CIC's Rob Ritter told The CJN.

"When they see things firsthand, they understand the complexities. There is no substitute for standing on top of the Golan. Similarly, if you don't walk through Jerusalem, you can't understand the real issues," Ritter said.

The parliamentarians met with Israeli, Palestinian and Druze officials, and they visited sites including Yad Vashem, the Knesset, Bethlehem, Gush Etzion, and the Dead Sea.

"I congratulate the CIC, because it shows that they're not just pushing one angle," said Solberg, while on a tour of Jaffa.

"I've rounded out my knowledge of the situation."

The group agreed that Canada can help Israel overcome some of its problems. MP Ovid Jackson, who has been to Israel once before, said, Canada "acts as a facilitator to help democratize places and to help create peace."

9 MPs, senator on educational visit

"We have no political objective other than to serve humanity," said Sarkis Assadourian, MP Brampton Centre. Assadourian, who was born in Syria and left in 1967, said the highlight of his trip was a visit to Rabin's tomb.

"It was a very emotional moment," said Assadourian, who had nominated Rabin for the Nobel Peace Prize. "It's too bad he didn't live to see the peace...I hope Barak continues the process that Rabin began."

The MPs learned about some of the main issues facing Israelis and Palestinians, including water, environment, refugees, borders and Jerusalem.

Lorne Nystrom, MP, Regina Qu'Appelle, said there is "so much money here used on the military, that could be used for more useful purposes. As long as there's no peace, that will continue. It doesn't make any sense."

Solberg said that as a result of the trip, he understood why security is such a huge issue.

"I think Canada's role can be to ensure that people support Israelis [and understand] that things are complicated," said Solberg, who hopes to return here for another visit.

"After having gone through five wars and a Holocaust, [Israelis] have every right to be cautious about how they proceed with negotiations with all the various parties."

Most of the parliamentarians refused to budge from their "Canadian middle ground" positions, but it was evident that some returned to Canada with new sympathies.

Hashim Thaci met twice this month with a special envoy of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, to whom he issued a letter ordering "the entire Kosovo Liberation Army under my control to respect and protect all the Jews of Kosovo." Earlier this month, three Jews were evacuated to Macedonia. There are about 40 Jews left in Kosovo.

U.S. Aid For Israel

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Senate overwhelmingly passed a foreign aid bill that includes $1.92 billion in military aid, and $960 million in economic aid to Israel. The bill, which passed 97-2 this month, reduced aid to Israel by $60 million and aid to Egypt by $40 million.

Religious Leaders Hope for Spiritual Rebuilding

BUDAPEST — Jewish, Christian and Muslim leaders from the former Yugoslavia and other Balkan countries have set up a permanent interreligious committee aimed at reconstructing the war-torn region, from a spiritual dimension.

Following a one-day meeting here last week, they stressed that education was needed to prevent further "religious and cultural hostility."

The leaders called upon "the integrity of the religious leaders throughout the region to speak with courage to their fellow believers, to turn the grief and feeling of loss into a catalyst which will heal what has been hurt and build what has been destroyed."

The Budapest meeting – the first such conference since the Kosovo conflict – was sponsored by the European Jewish Congress, the Conference of European Rabbis and the European Council of Synagogue Organizations.

The meeting brought together leaders from Catholic, Eastern Orthodox and Protestant churches, as well as religious and lay leaders of Muslim and Jewish communities, from Yugoslavia, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Croatia, Macedonia, Bulgaria, Hungary and Romania.

Municipalities back Montrealers' unity mission

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — From Leading Tickles, Nfld. (pop. 513) to Burnstick Lake, B.C. (pop. 403), 500 Canadian hamlets, villages, towns and cities in nine provinces and the Northwest Territories have adopted a resolution extending a hand of friendship to Quebec.

The People's Resolution for a United Canada is a project of two Jewish Montrealers, Aaron Makovka, 28, and Maurice Suissa, 37. They co-founded and are co-presidents of Team Canada for Unity (TCU).

They describe TCU as a grassroots organization that gives ordinary Canadians a means of expressing their desire for Quebec to remain in Canada, and for the French language and culture to flourish.

After the referendum in October, 1995, Makovka and Suissa searched for a way to let Quebecers know that other Canadians care about them. They chose to work at the municipal level, because they believe these governments are closer to the people.

More than 500 Canadian municipalities have passed the resolution to date, including the biggest, Toronto, whose mayor, Mel Lastman, is TCU's captain. The smallest municipality is the village of Fairlight in Saskatchewan (pop. 65).

While a majority of these municipalities have populations under 10,000, together they represent 11 million Canadians.

Most of the major cities have the resolution on their books, among them, Vancouver, Edmonton, Ottawa, Halifax and St. John's, with a few notable exceptions – Calgary and Winnipeg.

"Now when Premier Bouchard says the rest of Canada doesn't care about the fate of Quebec or the French language and culture, we can say he is wrong," Makovka said.

As a symbol of what he and Suissa call "one of the largest grassroots unity efforts ever undertaken," each of the endorsing towns submitted its municipal flag. These flags have been sewn into the Unity Quilt, which measures 85 by 22 feet.

On Canada Day, the quilt flew on the lead ship at the Toronto Harbor Parade of Lights, a major charity boating event. Mayor

Mosaic's new poetry

Mosaic Press is a small but feisty publishing house based in Oakville, Ont. It publishes important works in a range of subject areas, including the area of Judaica-related themes.

Across my desk this week I received from Mosaic Press three slim, elegantly designed and handsomely printed volumes of poetry. Each volume features the work of a different author.

Each of the authors – Morris Granatstein, Seymour Mayne and Simcha Simchovich – brings us deeply satisfying, inspiring poetry, tall trees in the rich, layered landscape of Jewish Canadian writing.

The works are ideal companions. They come in "small packages," but they are veritable large treasure troves of insight and emotion.

Most readers of The CJN will by now readily know that we regularly publish poetry in our pages. This is not the norm for the weekly tabloids of the North American Jewish press.

But we do so for the deep satisfaction that flows from sharing beautiful poetry with our readers, and in the hope that in the process, some of our readers, possibly, too, our young readers, will be inspired to try writing their own poems.

Granatstein's volume is called Welcome to the Year 2000 and Other Poems. As the introduction tells us, it "looks back on almost nine decades of [his] rich life."

Granatstein was born in Lodz, Poland, in 1911. He emigrated to Canada with his family in 1926, settling in downtown Toronto near the famous Kensington market in the Spadina and Dundas area.

The poem from which the title of the volume is taken is a long, free verse work, too long to reproduce in its entirety in this space but too moving not to excerpt, even though, in providing only an excerpt, I am not conveying the true essence of the poem or its full intended effect.

Goodbye to old century of what we were what we did what we became

On interconnected paths of encrusted consequences at crossings

See the mountain boulder
see the climbing heights taste the stone pebble on the tongue.

Old dwindling century shot through and through like pockmarked, perforated lives

But still counting the moons, the stars the suns in time to the feebling strokes of all old failing clocks in the world
in towers.

Paths toward final berth focused on the one blue eye, one brown,
one green, one black one dead.

Goodbye to crotchety limping cursed century.

Seymour Mayne, from Ottawa, has published more than a dozen collections of poetry. He has been the subject of articles in The CJN and he has provided poetry for us. He is widely read and widely renowned outside the borders of this country.

His present volume is entitled Carbon Filter. From this work I reproduce Finished Line. It is, in fact a poetic form of advice, lovingly offered to all aspiring writers.

Take your sweet time with the poems, no matter what those in a great big hurry say who like harebrained bounders never make it right to the finished line.

* * *

Readers of The CJN will also be familiar with the poetry of Simcha Simchovich. His poetry has appeared numerous times in our pages. It is humble and uniquely haunting, carrying in its rhymes and cadences, the inconsolable, constant ache of the survivor's heart. It is simple but so profound.

I reproduce My Little Grandson.

My little grandson, sweet and lively, fills with joy this heart of mine;
his pure innocence permeates me like healing rays of sunshine.

All my sadness dissipates like a cloud in morning light as I watch him on his tiny tractor riding proudly like a little knight.

Soon alighted, he is circling the room in joyful ecstasy, until I spread out my arms and embrace him lovingly.

Life upon you, little grandson,
of my old age – a shining crown.

Orthodox divided over approach to educating girls

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

How do you prepare young, Orthodox people to deal with the temptations and dangers of the modern world? How do you ensure that they retain their commitment to Jewish observance so that the tradition can be passed on to future generations?

Backgrounder

The Orthodox community uses basically two approaches. One is to have the young people face the outside world head-on, consciously arming them with the tools to live in both the religious and the secular worlds. The other is to have them live in an insulated world, keeping potentially harmful influences far away.

The tension between the two philosophies, felt strongly in the Orthodox world generally, plays itself out most visibly in the field of education.

The problems are exacerbated when dealing with education for girls. For centuries, there has been a debate about whether girls should be educated on the same level as boys, or should only learn what they need to know for the life they will lead. There is a fear of destroying the sense of tzniut, modesty, that is seen by the Orthodox view of Judaism as the essence of the Jewish woman, not only by putting her in educational competition with the opposite sex, but by exposing her to what are often considered corruptive secular influences.

While day school education, and ongoing adult educational programs may be new phenomena, it was always felt necessary for women to have at least enough education to be able to read prayers and religious works, and to do simple arithmetic.

Shoshana Zolty, in her book And All Your Children Shall Be Learned (Jason Aronson, 1993), says that from very early times, there were women, particularly those from rabbinic families, who were learned in Torah and even Talmud.

Nevertheless, many women received very little education. They were expected to pick up what they needed to know from their mothers – for example in the areas of kashrut, the holidays, family purity and so on.

When Chassidism arose in the late 18th and early 19th centuries, men and boys would often leave home to spend Shabbat and holy days at the court of their rebbe. This left women and girls in chassidic families at home with little spiritual guidance.

The situation started causing real concern when girls began to attend secular schools and were influenced, adversely it was felt, by modern philosophies antithetical to Jewish norms and values.

Shoshana Zolty

To make matters worse, what was happening was that boys were receiving an education almost exclusively in Torah and Talmud, and girls almost exclusively secular.

In 1918, Sarah Schenirer, a seamstress in Poland, took what was then a revolutionary step. She decided to found a school for girls that would teach both secular and religious subjects in a Torah atmosphere.

The school was named Bais Yaakov, from verse in the Torah in Exodus 19:3 that says: "Thus shall you say to the house of Jacob and tell the sons of Israel." The phrase "the house of Jacob," bais Yaakov, the commentators say, refers to the women of Israel.

It is hard for us to realize that in its day, Beth Jacob, which is now considered an extremely traditional school, was a very radical concept. The only way Schenirer could gain acceptance was by winning the support of the rebbe of the Ger Chassidim, Rabbi Avraham Mordechai Alter, and especially that of Rabbi Israel Meir haCohen Kagan, known as the Chofetz Hayim.

The school, which sprouted branches all over Poland, was a resounding success. After World War II, the movement was transplanted to the new world. Toronto now has a Bais Yaakov elementary school, a secondary school, a seminary and a teachers' training program.

Rabbi Akiva Stefansky, longtime principal of Beth Jacob High School of Toronto, said that the goal of the school is to "transmit to the students our tradition as we have been taught at Mount Sinai, and imbue them with the values and sterling character of our ancestors Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel and Leah."

He told The CJN that they try to provide teachers who can be role models in all subjects, but especially in religious ones. "Our teachers have to be able to communicate to our students the message we want to transmit to them."

This puts a heavy load on the staff and student body, he acknowledged. "We can't compromise on religious education, which requires time and energy, nor can we abrogate our responsibility for secular subjects."

Rabbi Stefansky said the school has no problem adapting the Ontario Ministry of Education guidelines to their ideology. For instance, "We don't teach the family studies course, because our definition of a family is diametrically opposed to their definition of the Canadian family."

The traditional Orthodox see the family as it was constituted in Genesis. "The first commandment is 'Be fruitful and multiply,' and any union that doesn't have this as an objective can't be considered a family," he said flatly.

The public schools, according to Rabbi Stefansky, "only disseminate information and skills. We want to build Torah personalities."

For that reason, he said, the school does not accept girls "who expose themselves to a value system that is diametrically opposed to our purpose of existence," such as television, movies and the Internet.

The religious studies program is heavily weighted to Torah, Navi (Prophets) and Psalms, "where we find the Torah lifestyle described and lived by outstanding models of virtue.

"Showing the students the beauty and harmony of that lifestyle develops in them a desire to emulate it," he said.

With very few exceptions, Rabbi Stefansky said, the students spend at least one year after high school learning in seminary. After that, they take extra training in fields that are considered compatible with the Orthodox lifestyle, such as teaching.

The graduates are not encouraged to attend university, which in a previous interview Rabbi Stefansky referred to as "corrosive." He puts his opinion bluntly: "To raise healthy, self-reliant children, you need a career mother at home, not a part-time mother who has a career outside."

Nevertheless, the Bais Yaakov world made a concession of sorts to today's needs. A program called Maalot offers university courses accredited by the American Council on Education in Washington, D.C.

The principal, Rabbi Yosef Posen, told The CJN that the 50 or so students, all of whom must have finished one year post-high school education, can either take a degree in humanities, computer science, psychology or liberal studies, or take individual courses, which can lead to another degree elsewhere.

Maalot has a "special relationship," he said, with Thomas Edison State College in Trenton, N.J., which grants the degrees.

Maalot classes are held at the Beth Jacob campus at Lawrence and Bathurst, and at the Maalot offices at Douglas and Bathurst.

Teachers are qualified and respected academics, he said, who, because they are also members of the Orthodox community, "understand where the students are coming from."

Rabbi Posen explained that the girls remain in an environment "conducive to the standards of Torah Judaism," where they don't have to face experiences contrary to those they have grown up with, can take more advanced Jewish studies courses, and stay in the familiar Beth Jacob setting.

Material is covered in a more "conservative" fashion, using more sensitive and appropriate examples and language than a university might, he said.

It should be noted, he said, that many girls in the haredi community would not get any university education if it were not for Maalot. "Many of them wouldn't be comfortable in a university atmosphere, and many of their parents wouldn't allow them to attend anyway."

There is one positive outcome of the Beth Jacob philosophy. Within the constraints of the school's ideology, girls are encouraged to develop their talents, whatever they are. Since academic excellence is not a goal in itself, those with other capabilities have the opportunity to shine in music, drama, arts and crafts, and organization, especially through an annual production in which the whole school takes part, and in the Beth Jacob convention, which is held in Toronto every four years.

While one might be forgiven for considering Beth Jacob at the extreme of the religious educational spectrum, in fact, it is not. A new school, Bnos Bais Yaakov, is scheduled to open in Toronto in September. While there is no reason to think that its basic philosophy will be very different, the belief in the community is that the intention of the school's founders is to keep their daughters from being exposed to the damaging influence of those who are not as strict.

Rabbi Chaim Finkel, principal of the new school, declined to be interviewed at this time.

Another new entry in Orthodox girls' education is Bais Chomesh High School for Girls, which will open with a Grade 9 class this September. Sultana Nakar, a member of the board of directors, said that it will combine Chabad (Lubavitch) teachings with a yeshiva program and a fully accredited general studies program.

Judaic artifacts exhibit held at retirement home

By ANNA TURKIENICZ
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — An exhibit of Judaic artifacts provided nostalgic and personal satisfaction for the residents and visitors at the first annual Toronto Judaica Exhibit held at Terrace Gardens Retirement Residence, according to its general manager.

On display, was a mixture of books on Jewish themes, artwork by Jewish artists, Judaic antiques, such as candelabras, and more current pieces such as embroidered challah covers and kippot. Artisans were also there showing how to make tfillin and tzitzit.

Urn from late 19th century. Made in Israel.

"There was an interest from the residents in seeing these things," said Yoav Bohbot. "It touches them personally."

"It was also important to provide an event which would bring the community into the building since many of our residents do not often leave the building," Bohbot said.

A show of this nature provides residents with a connection to their past through the artifacts, he said. It can also give them a focus on their present through the more current articles on display.

"In the planning stages of the show, we were overwhelmed with phone calls from exhibitors. However, it was decided that it would be more important this time to go with a more simple, elegant show," Bohbot said.

Two pieces by Canadian artist Daniel Kerem were featured – a wooden box for prayerbooks and a pair of metal candlesticks. Kerem is known for the metal fence around the parliament building in Ottawa, which was commissioned by the Canadian government.

Other art works on display were paintings by Reudor, a seventh generation Israeli, and Isaacc Besancon, an artist who first displayed his work at the age of 15 in the Duncan Gallery in Paris.

Judaica, antique and by-commission pieces were shown on tables throughout the hall.

A klezmer band played, as some visitors and residents danced, and others sat back to listen.

The residence hopes to make this an annual event, said Bohbot, who was pleased that everyone – "exhibitors, residents and visitors enjoyed their day."

Schools mirror the divisions within Orthodox community

"We want to produce girls who are stable in Torah education and Chabad, to instil leadership qualities, not just knowledge and skills," she said. The students will have the academic credits to go to university "at any point in their lives," Nakar added.

"We want to teach Chassidus and ahavas Yisroel (love of the Jewish people) so as to hasten the coming of Mashiach," she said.

A very different approach to education for Orthodox girls is taken at Ulpanat Orot, the only Bnei Akiva school in North America. It is the sister school for girls to Or Chaim Yeshiva, and shares a rosh yeshiva, most recently Rabbi Moshe Yeres, and many of the staff.

Bnei Akiva schools, said Rabbi Yeres, were created to "give a quality education to boys and girls."

The primary goals, he explained, are to enable the student to have a firm grounding in Jewish texts, and be fluent in analyzing and understanding primary source material such as Torah, Navi, the Oral Law, and commentaries; to provide a good preparation for university; and to instil a belief in the centrality of Israel.

"We want our students to be proud of their Jewish heritage, and prepared to be productive citizens of Canada and of Israel," Rabbi Yeres said.

At the same time, he said, Ulpana is conscious of the particular needs of the Jewish woman. In the OAC year, for example, a class called mishpachah (family), teaches the laws of marriage, as well as such concerns as dating, interpersonal relations, the qualities to look for in a mate, and the role of the Jewish woman in today's world.

Most of the girls spend a year in seminaries or women's yeshivot in Israel before going on to university, he said.

Ulpanat Orot, as the school readily acknowledges, is not for everyone. The school accepts only applicants who are prepared and able to cope with an extremely demanding academic load.

This leaves a very real void for the student who cannot deal with it, but whose family follows the Bnei Akiva philosophy. Where do these girls go? Do they switch to a school whose world outlook is to a large extent different from theirs? Do they go to CHAT, which does offer remedial help but whose program is also academically rigorous? Or do they opt for a public school, where they will be the odd man out, so to speak?

It is significant that there is very little formal contact between the schools. Programs and special events are held separately, and there are no joint sports leagues or competitions. There is no sharing of facilities and little of staff, although some general studies teachers teach, for instance, at Beth Jacob and Ulpanat Orot.

It is also significant that the schools mirror the divisions in the Orthodox community itself. The "other" schools, and often the students in them, are seen not as different sides of the same coin, but as coins of lower value.

And that may be the most serious outcome of all for the Orthodox community.

TORONTO — Ed Fitch cradles his chin and furrows his brow when it's pointed out that there's a hospital named after him in Montreal. He's puzzled. "The Jewish General," he's finally told, and he laughs – a dignified, understated chuckle.

Attired in the crisp greens of the Canadian Armed Forces, Fitch responds by saying he was born at the Jewish General, and offers a punchline of his own: He's been a military man for 32 years, and "I have to decide pretty soon whether to make a career of it," he says drily.

The Canadian army helped him decide last month, when Fitch was promoted from lieutenant-colonel to brigadier-general, putting him in the rarefied company of only about 70 others in Canada who sport a three-inch gold stripe on their sleeve and a single maple leaf on their uniforms. (Each successive leaf, up to four, translates into, respectively, major-general, lieutenant-general, and general).

The 50-year-old Fitch is not Canada's first Jewish general. That honor probably belonged to Robert Rothschild, who attained the rank of major-general in the Quartermaster Corps after World War II.

Fitch is likely the highest ranking Jewish member of the Canadian Armed Forces. Officially, the Forces do not keep track of members' religion, or at least, do not release that information to the public. In any event, Fitch says faith is not an issue, except sometimes on peacekeeping missions, when a host nation's sensitivities are respected by excluding women or members of certain ethnic or religious backgrounds.

In all his time in uniform, he's never encountered any anti-Semitic bias, which he calls "remarkable."

He got word of his promotion last February when he was visiting Dieppe, site of the disastrous 1942 Allied raid, in which 907 Canadians were killed and nearly 2,000 taken prisoner.

"I got a phone call from the Chief of Defence Staff. It was a very emotional moment. I went for a walk on the beach to commune with those who had died [in the raid]. I then told my wife that she was going to be mother to 12,000 soldiers."

That's roughly the number of Forces members who will now fall under Fitch's purview as he assumes command of Land Force Western Area, based in Edmonton, where he will be responsible for Force's activities in the four western provinces. These soldiers will be the first to be called in case of a natural disaster in those provinces.

The posting is for the next two to three years. Fitch will be joined by his wife, Sharon (née Paul) and their two daughters, Rena, 19, and Leora, 13.

He'll also be involved in training of troops for peacekeeping and other missions.

The Montreal-born and raised Fitch, who was bar mitzvahed at the Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue and attended West Hill High School, joined up at 17, spurred by a youthful sense of adventure and two main role models: his father Burton, who had been a platoon leader in the first Canadian battalion to raise the country's flag on German soil in 1945, and an uncle who was a medical officer stationed in England. "It was just something I wanted to try," Fitch says.

A fully subsidized education didn't hurt either. He graduated as a civil engineer in 1971.

From 1975 to '78, he was stationed in the former West Germany, and recalls the spine-chilling feeling. "I stood on a street corner in Munich. Thirty-five years earlier, I could have been taken away and shot just for standing there."

Twenty years on, Fitch has several commands under his belt, mainly in his field of engineering. He was also a member of the Canadian delegation that helped hammer out the much-praised international landmine treaty Canada drafted, and which has been signed by dozens of nations.

In June, Fitch was honored for heroism by Ve'ahavta, the organization that sends medical missions overseas and is involved in several humanitarian projects locally, for having voluntarily extended his tour of duty in the former Yugoslavia to work at a refugee camp.

"It was a de facto concentration camp," Fitch says of the facility in Croatia that housed up to 25,000 inmates. "People could not come and go as they pleased."

He spent a year in Bosnia and Croatia under the UN's flag – eight months longer that he'd planned – to help the local population rebuild their shattered infrastructure. "Thirty years of training and practice – I used it all," he recalls.

The work of a peacetime soldier, he muses, is "a very Jewish concept. I've gained knowledge of the fundamental philosophy of tikkun olam (repair of the world). Fortunately, I've been a soldier at a time when that's what soldiers did."

Fitch recently wound up a six-month stint in Toronto, where he was enrolled in the National Security Studies Course at the Canadian Forces College, near Yonge Street at Wilson Avenue. Essentially, the course teaches high-ranking officers the delicate task of interfacing with politicians.

While here, he was a regular at Shaarei Tefillah Congregation. Until their move to Edmonton, the family belonged to Machzikei Hadas Congregation in Ottawa.

Fitch is also an accomplished marksman. He was a shootist on Canada's Maccabi target air pistol team in 1989, when he picked up one silver and three bronze medals, and again in 1993, when he won two bronze medals.

On a personal level, his career has been "a slow self-discovery. This just suits me. The concept of working for money never drove me." Clearly, Fitch is not looking forward to retiring, which he must do at age 55.

Playing on the Forces' motto – There's No Life Like It – the newly minted general says his "is not a job…it's an avocation, a calling. I can't imagine doing anything else."

BGU Associates to attend Cirque's big top

TORONTO — East and west are joined in Cirque du Soleil's new show Dralion being performed this summer under the blue and yellow big top at Ontario Place.

The same concept applies to Toronto's New Ben-Gurion Associates, and its special relationship with Ben-Gurion University of the Negev (BGU).

On Aug. 11, 250 New Ben-Gurion associates will attend Dralion as a fundraiser for Ben-Gurion University, specifically designated towards BGU's community action unit.

Charged with a special mandate of spearheading the development of the Negev, BGU regards the human and social aspects of its mission as important as technological, industrial and agricultural advances.

Through the community action unit, more than half of Ben-Gurion's student body of 14,000 lend their time, knowledge and skills to improve the quality of life for residents of all ages in disadvantaged neighborhoods. The unit helps the unemployed, the elderly, and the immigrants from North Africa, the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia.

Gifted children, the Bedouin population and former soldiers benefit from pre-academic programs tailored to their specific needs.

The group has set a goal of $50,000 to establish an endowment fund that will enable the community action unit to expand its programs and activities.

The show will be preceded by a supper reception at Ontario Place. Door prizes will be offered. As an added feature, each adult attending will receive a voucher from Etre Belle Canada for a complimentary demi-facial (valued at $45).

In his own words...

Even before he presented his government to the Knesset last Tuesday, the insults were already flying toward Prime Minister Ehud Barak. "Barak takes charge, but with a black eye," one headline screamed. The "black eye" was a reference to the rejection of Barak's personal candidate for Knesset speaker, Shalom Simchon, by the Labor party faction in favor of Avraham Burg. Burg was ultimately accepted as the speaker by an overwhelming majority of Knesset members.

The day after the official swearing-in of the new cabinet, one columnist wrote: "He [Barak] promises excellence and new faces, but they're not to be seen in his government."

The severe, sharp edges of political life in Israel are like stiletto coral reefs across which notoriously tough politicians are dragged every day without mercy until they bleed too much and decide, simply, to walk away from public life and from the reddened reefs.

Barak spoke forcefully and eloquently when he presented his cabinet to the Knesset. Echoing the promises on which he had campaigned some weeks before, he emphasized the importance of dealing with urgent domestic issues.

In his own words, this is part of what Barak said: "The most important mission which the government will take upon itself in the social sphere is the positioning of education as its top priority... The government will allocate resources and efforts in order to bring about a change and breathe a new spirit into the entire education system... And to the same extent, the government will work to education toward values, personal morality, work ethics, social responsibility, volunteerism, assistance to fellow human beings, justice, respect for the law and a loathing for injustice and violence...

"The State of Israel has not always been sufficiently wise to grant all its citizens a sense of equality and partnership. The disparities are great, and the sentiment of bitterness is not unjustified... I pledge today that the government... will make every effort to gradually bridge the gaps, dissipate the alienation and provide equality for all sectors of the population in Israel...

"The primary consideration... was the need to find the broadest possible common denominator to bring together representatives of parties and sectors from various, even opposing, sides of Israeli society ...We will first have to make the painful compromises among ourselves, via a policy which is the fruit of a broad-based, sober and realistic consensus...

"This government will not turn its back on any group, portion, sector or ideological stream in Israeli society. This will be a government of constant dialogue, openness and attentiveness, a government that will aspire to a 'new national consensus'...

"I believe that bearing responsibility together will bring the extremes closer, blunt the contrasts in society and will require consideration, attentiveness and mutual balances – since it has already been said in the Torah, and about our Torah: 'Its paths are paths of pleasantness, and all its ways are ways of peace.' In this way, we will be able, together, to face the tests and decisions which await us. In this way, we will be stronger and more united, despite the disputes and the diversity of opinion among us. Perhaps we will become wiser, because we will be guided by shared wisdom."

These are important words. We hope and pray they will enjoy important meaning. We wish Prime Minister Barak and his newly formed government success in all their endeavors. May their deliberations, indeed, be wise and prudent, courageous and fair.

Strong opposition to Trans-Israel Highway

As a longtime resident of Israel currently visiting his native Canada, I was very surprised to learn (CJN, June 24), that the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce (CICC) has recently lauded the Canadian Highways Internationals Corp. for its part in the projected Trans-Israel Highway.

The people at CICC are apparently unaware that the project has met with strong oppostion from thinking Israelis as being unnecessary, economically wasteful and ecologically very damaging. The project's only supporters seem to be interested parties and politicians.

Its touted benefits for Israel can hardly be expected to exceed the few (if any) benefits of its role model, Highway 407, has brought to the people of Ontario. As for its several thousand construction jobs, virtually all will surely go to cheap labor from such places as Romania, Thailand and Indonesia.

I find it very sad that pro-Israel bodies like the CICC seem to be so out of touch with the realities of life in Israel.

Former Canadian diplomat pays tribute to 'Mrs. Judy'

On May 30, I attended at Temple Israel in Ottawa a presentation by Prof. Harold Troper of his book: The Ransomed of God. It was a moment to remember and it helped us become even more aware of Judy Feld Carr's dedication to the cause of the Syrian Jews.

Later, when I read the book, it was humbling to realize that my contact with Feld Carr on this issue started in September 1990. Remembering the amount of time and energy spent on this issue, it is almost beyond human belief that Feld Carr had actually done far more during the same period and had done so for two decades before. Troper's book bears witness to this heroic story.

In spite of Feld Carr's unrelenting demands in support of her aims on behalf of the Syrian Jews, this has now become a source of cherished memories for me. I joined the Canadian foreign service on the memorable date of June 5, 1967, and retired recently. That the path of my life crossed Feld Carr's is a blessing. I am gratified that she gave me the opportunity to demonstrate the possibility open to each of us, whatever our background and choice of life, to work together in promoting such individual but universal human principles as freedom of movement.

Read this book and keep in mind that in spite of Troper's remarkably detailed presentation, there remain a lot of untold stories in "Mrs. Judy's" odyssey.

When you read the book, you will catch a glimpse of what it is to consecrate one's life to deserving causes.

Decries cut-throat competition for used clothing

The article concerning the competition for clothes boxes between JF&CS and B'nai Brith (June 24) is instructive. It's interesting that the field of human services in the not-for-profit charitable sector has taken on all those wonderful characteristics of the world of business: "who can take over whom," and survival of the "fittest" or the "biggest." If an organization won't let you take them over, then go into their business and either push them out or cut into their market. Great discipline, wonderful values!

Any real sense of what's in the community's best interest gets lost in jumbled rationalizations. It's time to give some of our community organizations' egos a rest and to have them remind them of who and what they are.

Opposes spending $2 million on Auschwitz synagogue

I would like to express my complete agreement with the article written by Sholem Hershkop (Yiddish Vinkel, CJN, June 17). He criticized the decision taken by some American Jewish philanthropists to spend $2 million on a synagogue near the death camp in Auschwitz.

Why rebuild a synagogue in such a Jewish desert, he asks, where it may even be defaced and its Torahs and prayer books stolen? This has already been happening to other Jewish monuments in Poland. I am a Holocaust survivor from Lodz and totally concur with his point of view. The money, in my opinion, would be far better spent on Jewish projects in North America.

Israel's 28th government

Haim Ramon

Nathan Sharansky

The following is an excerpt from the text of Prime Minister Ehud Barak's speech to the Knesset upon presentation of his government Tuesday, July 7, 1999.

Mr. Speaker, Distinguished Knesset,

I am proud to submit to the people and the House a new, broad-based, good, representative government, supported by the large majority of Knesset members and the citizens of the state.

It was not in vain that I took advantage of the full time allotted by law to form the government. I did not take the easy way.

The lessons of Jewish history and the depth of the social and political chasm in Israel today required me to choose the long and patient way in order to achieve the goal which I had set for myself: to form a government which will act during a time of difficult national decisions, through consent and balance between most sections of the people. I did not accept any disqualification of any side.

During the negotiations I seriously examined the possibility of expanding the basis of the coalition even further. This was not possible and in retrospect, this may have been best.

In a democratic system, there is great importance to the role of a parliamentary opposition, and it is my intention to express my recognition of this by maintaining ongoing contacts with, providing information to and holding consultations with the heads of those factions which are not members of the coalition.

I expect substantive and constructive criticism from the opposition which will also enable consideration of its opinion in managing affairs of state…

The basic guidelines of the government and the coalition agreements are before you. Everything is open and fully disclosed. Nothing is concealed. There are no secret agreements, no "under-the-table" understandings, and as you have seen, there are neither financial commitments nor favors to specific sectors or groups.

I will not go into the details of all the government guidelines. The guidelines constitute the identity card of the government, the principles of its policy and its declaration of intent.

All previous governments had good intentions. Not all were equally successful in putting them into practice. I know that the government will be judged by its actions, not its intentions. I will try will all my might to ensure that the gap between its good intentions and its actions is as narrow as possible…

In the coming days, I will bring before the Knesset a proposed change to "The Basic Law: The Government" for an increase in the number of ministers, as required by the size of the coalition and the composition of the Knesset.

In any form, this is the best government for the State of Israel at this time. We are the bearers of the torch which our predecessors have transferred to us, and we assume full responsibility for moving forward.

Today, the government requests the confidence of the 15th Knesset in the knowledge that the eyes of all Israelis are focused thereon, in prayer and with great hope.

Today, millions of eyes in Israel, millions of eyes of Jews around the world, and millions of eyes around the whole world are focused on us, praying that we will know how to lead the country, with determination and a sure hand toward a new path, and a new page in the chronicles of the State of Israel – a new page of peace in an arena which, in recent generations, has known mostly pain, bereavement and suffering.

Accompanied by the blessings and concern of everyone, we embark today on the long and arduous path. I would be most appreciative if you would express your confidence in the government today and wish it well and Godspeed.

Opinions

Very special memories

Some weeks ago, I had occasion to chair a memorable meeting. It took place at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and dealt with restitution and other payments (including the Swiss Funds for Holocaust Survivors).

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

When the lectures were over and the questions began, it became obvious that nothing relating to the Shoah can ever be treated calmly and rationally, for that event itself was total evil, so that even now – so long afterwards – anyone who touches it will be caught up in its irrationality. It took only a few moments in the question-and-answer period to have bitter emotions come to the fore, and memories of terrible yesterdays tried to come to terms with the realities and opportunities of today. At events of this kind, there will always be many questions, and not all of them can ever be answered satisfactorily. It was no different on that evening.

Afterwards, I was given a lovely looking, slender volume as a token of appreciation. It is called Collective Poems: The Terrace Holocaust Survivors Group. Beautifully produced, edited and illustrated by Paula David, and printed in truly legible, large and bold letters, it presents a memorable assemblage of poems by a small group of women who worked both individually and together on this collection. The oldest participant is 95 years of age, the youngest 82.

Here are two samples, and they will speak for themselves:

WHO COULD UNDERSTAND

Even the North American Jews – they can't understand.
Nobody can feel what we lived through.
They wouldn't understand because we ourselves can't understand
We lived through everything we did and we don't know how.
We lived through everything and it hurts to talk about it.
I personally cannot understand how I went through it.
And I am still here.
How I survived.
I am still a person.
After everything I saw and heard and felt.
It makes sense that people should understand,
But how can there be any sense out of Auschwitz?

WORDS FOR HOPE

I speak five languages,
But I have no words for the Camps.
The Eskimos have many words for snow,
But we know only one word for death.
I have only tears.
Enough tears for many lives.
I cannot cry and I cannot laugh.
I can talk, and I want to talk.
If the new generations will listen,
The survivors might find words for hope.

'A woman of worth'

The Victoria Jewish community is as varied and diverse a community as you would expect to find anywhere in the Jewish world. It sits, however, not only at the far edge of the continent – on an island, yet – but also at the edges of consciousness of the rest of Canadian Jewry. In this it is usually joined by its sister city, Vancouver, although in recent years we have made enough noise to get noticed now and again by the folks "down East."

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

When you are in Victoria, however, and engaged with the community, you feel just as at home as you would in Willowdale. On a sparkling Shabbat morning, entering the jewel of a synagogue that serves as the major house of worship for much of the community, you are immediately engulfed by the warmth of the davening.

The building itself is a gracious gem, restored not many years ago to its pristine cool loveliness. Based on the old European model with three doors leading to a small vestibule and then into the main sanctuary, it has white columns gracefully supporting the balcony that runs along three sides. A blue-tinted rose window brings in soft light. The whiteness of the walls shows off the brilliance of the ark curtain. And what a curtain! It features the hills and green mountains of the province, the blue water, and two magnificent eagles, one sitting and one in flight.

We were here to visit friends, and had the good fortune to be able to celebrate a special birthday for a very special member of the community.

Bernice Levitz Packford arrived in 1953 and since then Victoria, and the Jewish community, have never been without her guiding presence. Her tribute was something to savor.

We met Bernice first in the tense years after the 1973 war, when Jews and Israel were under attack as racists and aggressors, and when the media and the universities were full of Jew hatred. We were invited to Victoria to participate in a Hadassah-sponsored seminar on Israeli-Palestinian issues. We met Bernice, by then a 20-year veteran in Hadassah and the Temple Emanu-el congregation, who was instrumental in creating the the Victoria Jewish Appeal Society, the forerunner of the present Victoria Federation, which has enhanced the community's ability to fund seniors and youth programs, the Hebrew school, the Jewish Community Centre and Israel.

But what makes Bernice's life a standard for all to follow is that not only has she stood by her people all these years, but she has made a commitment to social justice in the widest possible community context.

Although initially hampered by lack of funds from getting a university education at the beginning of World War II, she did complete her social work training in Toronto, and hearing that British Columbia had the most advanced social legislation in the country, she set out for B.C., coming to Victoria in 1953 with her daughter Leah. Her mother also lived with her for many years.

To list Bernice's accomplishments in the field of social work would take pages; her main interest is in child and family welfare. Her work with foster children and parents led to the creation of the first North American Foster Parent Association, a movement that spread across North America. She also helped form the B.C. Council for the Family, the Capital (Victoria) Families Association, and she has found many other ways to assist families in crisis or in need.

They tell me it is very hard to say no to Bernice, so rabbis, watch out!

Her most recent effort has been in inspiring the Victoria community to support agunot who need help in procuring a get. And she seems to have jump-started the synagogue social action committee, which is active in environmental causes. When we were there on Shabbat, the synagogue was planning to join several eco-tours of organic farms. It goes without saying that Bernice was the original re-use, re-cycle person.

She lobbied against the recent bank merger proposals and is a vigorous supporter of the local Credit Union. She explored alternatives to job losses in the dockside industries of Victoria and Esquimalt, and became president of the Victoria Esquimalt Working Harbor Association.

She is also active in interfaith dialogue and a friend of (retired) Bishop Remy de Roo, a man long known and esteemed for his own commitment to a just society.

I have run out of space to tell you all the things that owe their existence to Bernice. Let me close by saying a word about Victoria. I had the honor of doing a community study for their federation a few years ago, and I concluded that Victoria is a good example of what future Jewish communities may look like. So kol ha-kavod to Bernice. and to the Victoria community for nurturing such a true woman of worth.

Learning from our youth

Something truly amazing happened in Edmonton last month – a Jewish organization held its annual elections and there was actually competition for the executive positions!

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

This is almost unprecedented. I served 2½ years as president of my synagogue, two years as president of the federation, and two years as co-chair of the UJA campaign. Not once did anyone ever run against me in elections for those positions. As a critic of mine once said: "It is true that you are the president, but it is not a highly sought-after position."

Truer words have never been spoken. In all my years in this community, I have never witnessed a contest for any executive position. I suspect other communities are no different from Edmonton in this respect.

So, in which communal organization did these electoral contests take place? They occurred in the Ahava chapter of B'nai Brith Girls (BBG), my daughter Gail's chapter.

For whatever reason, the young women in this organization wanted to hold executive positions. Perhaps they thought that their vision of the organization was better than that of their competitors, or perhaps they believed that they had better leadership skills than their competitors, or perhaps they just wanted the kavod, whatever that may mean in this context.

It does not really matter. The fact is that these young women were determined to stand for elective office, were prepared to make speeches indicating what they would do if elected, and were willing to endure the potential embarrassment of rejection if defeated.

I am told that, at the BBYO regional convention, the competition for elected office was even more intense.

The question is not why young people in this organization choose to run for elective office. The real question here is why adults DO NOT. I think the answer is simple. Most adults realize what awaits them should they decide to assume leadership positions in one of our Jewish institutions or organizations. And what awaits them is, unfortunately, complaints and criticism, insults and abuse.

The scenario is a familiar one. A well-meaning and dedicated individual decides to assume a leadership role in one of our institutions thinking that he or she is volunteering to better the Jewish community. Initially, the individual becomes a board member. A controversial issue arises; the matter is studied at length; a full debate takes places within the institution; and a decision is made in good faith .

The next thing the individual knows, the board upon which he or she sits is being publicly attacked for its decision. Board members are vilified as if they had derived some personal benefit from the decision. In the alternative, they are treated as if they are politicians answering to the electorate rather than volunteers trying to help their community.

And the president tends to be the focal point of this assault. The result? Our dedicated volunteer will not, generally, assume any higher position in the institution and likely, will in due course resign from the board.

On Shabbat Korach, we celebrated my son Joel's bar mitzvah. I learned much from his d'var Torah.

I learned that dissent, generally, is a healthy state of affairs. Judaism has a long tradition of dissent. The debates between the House of Hillel and the House of Shammai are an example of our acceptance – even approval – of dissent.

Some dissent, however, is not endorsed. An example of the latter is Korach's rebellion against Moses. What is the difference between the two? According to our sources, the Hillel/Shammai debates were dissent "for the sake of Heaven." They were engaged in a halachic debate whose basic premise was the service of God.

Korach's rebellion, on the other hand, was "not for the sake of Heaven" because it was based purely upon jealousy and the pursuit of personal power. What does this mean in the context of today's Jewish communal life?

Free and open debate is essential to the future vibrancy of our Jewish institutions. However, dissent must be for the purposes of enhancing and bettering our Jewish institutions and not for the object of destroying them.

Dissent is only legitimate if it comes from individuals who are committed to the future of the institution and have demonstrated their commitment through ongoing personal and financial support. Further, it is essential that the debate be conducted in an atmosphere of derech eretz, with sensitivity and civility to other participants in the debate and certainly must be free of personal invective.

Perhaps most significantly, those who dissent should offer themselves for elective office and subject their vision of the institution's future to the democratic processes of the institution – just as the young women of the Ahava chapter of BBG were prepared to do. In Jewish communal life, we can learn a lot from our youth.

Learning from our mistakes

By RABBI RONALD WEISS

There is an apocryphal story told of the great baseball philosopher, Yogi Berra, who upon winning yet another championship with the New York Yankees, is said to have remarked: "It seems like deja vu all over again."

At various times in our lives, each of us encounter events or circumstances that we seem to have experienced before. Hopefully, we learn from our experiences and do not repeat our mistakes. Halavai, it would be so easy.

Throughout the course of our collective history, we Jews have confronted three experiences which have challenged our ability to live as Jews. These experiences are marked on our calendar by the holidays of Purim, Chanukah and Tisha b'Av. As this Shabbat, Parshat Devarim, is also called Shabbat Hazon, the Shabbat of Vision, and is always read the Shabbat before Tisha b'Av, perhaps it would be of interest to examine these holidays more closely and see how they impact upon our lives.

The first recurrent challenge to our ability to live as Jews is anti-Semitism. Hatred of Jews culminates in the attempt to physically obliterate the Jewish people by first degrading and then planning the actual destruction of our people. The story of how the Jews dealt with this threat is told on Purim.

The second periodic challenge is total acceptance. Jews were invited to join the societies around them and give up their uniqueness, on the grounds that it was no longer necessary to remain different. The surrounding non-Jewish culture seemed to aspire to all of the good values advocated by Judaism, and its population was ready to become one with the Jewish people.

Unfortunately, the price of acceptance was the spiritual destruction of that which is distinctively Jewish. This recurring attraction to assimilate into the larger host society, and how we cope with such a threat to our existence, is commemorated on Chanukah.

Tisha b'Av tells of the third dangerous threat to the Jewish people. We re-experience the destruction of both Temples, first by Babylon and then by Rome. The national disaster of our exile from Eretz Yisrael struck at the heart of our special relationship with the Almighty, and called our continued survival into question, both physically and spiritually.

How do we, as Jews, react to the threats and challenges of each experience? On Purim, the holiday that commemorates the attempted physical destruction of our people, we eat and drink. The festive Purim seudah (meal) and the drinking of beverages is meant to demonstrate in unequivocal terms that we are alive. After all, the dead don't eat or drink.

On Chanukah, the holiday that celebrates our victory over the Greek-Syrian threat to our continued spiritual existence, we light candles which represent the Jewish soul burning brightly. Our rededication to the traditional values that had been under attack by the forces of assimilation is truly a cause for great rejoicing.

But what of Tisha b'Av? On the holiday marking the death of our national independence and the destruction of all that we, as Jews, held dear – what do we do? The pervasive Jewish response to such overwhelming loss and tragedy is to cry. In the three weeks leading up to Tisha b'Av, we strive to establish an awareness of what it was that we lost. We focus our attention on the historical aspects of what took place as a means of trying to feel the enormous spiritual rift the Jews of those generations must have experienced. We strive to relive these events and internalize their impact within our own lives.

Yet, to truly understand what the nature of our focus ought to be, we need look no further than the Haftorah for Parshat Devarim, Shabbat of Vision. As one of my teachers pointed out, the prophet Isaiah does not lament the fact that the Holy Temple was destroyed; rather, he agonizes over the underlying causes of that destruction. Thus, the annual observance of Tisha b'Av serves to focus our national mourning, not towards the past, but to the present.

It is not enough to anguish over the great losses of previous generations. We must use our mourning today as a means to begin an examination of our present day situation. What are our thoughts, feelings and deeds towards God, our fellow Jews and society at large? What have we done to eliminate the attitudes and practices that sent our ancestors into exile thousands of years ago, not once but twice? What can we do to improve ourselves, our communities and society, and ensure that it never happens again?

Yogi was right. It is "Deja vu all over again."

Have a meaningful fast.

Checking with the experts

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, more rabbis on the Internet who are willing to field your questions and maybe engage in some online debate. A reminder: check out the credentials of the rabbi you are dealing with and direct complicated problems to a reliable authority.

You don't have to have sex on your mind to ask a question of Rabbi Shmuley Boteach [http://www.lchaim.org/]. In fact the rabbi of Oxford University's L'Chaim Society was fielding questions of all sorts before he became famous for his books The Jewish Guide to Adultery and Kosher Sex.

Some essays posted on his Web site include advice on what to do if someone tells an unfunny joke – "If all else fails and you can't even offer a light chortle, just laugh because laughter is Godly and holy." He also looks at the problem of husbands who won't grant a Jewish divorce – "There are times when rabbinic inaction and cowardice leads directly to sin. There is no stronger example of this than the painful saga of the agunah, the chained wife."

And, yes, Rabbi Boteach does address more intimate questions, which you can find on his Web site. You can subscribe to his essays at Shamash [http://www.shamash.org/help/listoflists.html]

Are you planning on a trip and have a question about travel and Jewish law? Then your first stop should be at Jewish Travel [http://www.shamash.org/jewishtravel/rabbi/asktherabbi.html]. One fascinating question deals with whether Jewish travellers to Korea and Taiwan should observe Shabbat on the local Saturday. The answer is quite complicated since there is a "halachic international dateline" a certain number of degrees east of Jerusalem. In that region, some rabbis require that Shabbat be observed completely on the local Saturday as well as partially the next day.

Over at the Microsoft Network's Cyber-Synagogue, there are two rabbis' offices [http://communities.msn.com/jewish/cybersynagogue.asp]. Rabbi Avram Rothman of Ohr Somayach in Toronto fields questions from an Orthodox perspective. Right next door is the office of Rabbi Niles Elliot Goldstein who addresses Liberal questions. Both rabbis also maintain discussion areas where readers are invited discuss and debate.

Rabbi Goldstein has written a fascinating article in Newsweek about his outreach experiences with his Online Synagogue [http://communities.msn.com/jewish/asktherabbi/niles_onlinesynagogue.asp].

Compared to real temples where he has served in the past, Rabbi Goldstein finds online synagogues liberating. He no longer has to deal with members who use their wealth to sway temple policy. And the anonymity of the Internet has liberated people to speak out and say things they never would have dared to say in a real congregation

In future columns, rabbis who answer kashrut questions on line tell you how to answer missionaries – and my favorite Ask the Rabbi site on the Web.

A unique personality

Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik, Man of Halacha Man of Faith*, edited by M.D. Genack (KTAV Publishing).

Books
Bernard Baskin

Rabbi Joseph B. Solovetchik, known affectionately by his students and admirers as "the Rav," was a unique personality.

A formidable talmudist, halachic authority and peerless teacher, he was North America's leading exponent of modern Orthodoxy, as well as religious Zionism. The descendant of a long line of Lithuanian talmudists, he was also the holder of a doctorate in philosophy from the University of Berlin.

As head of the rabbinic program at Yeshiva University's Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary, and chief rabbi of the Boston community, his influence was incalculable. He gave smichah to some 2,000 rabbis.

His logical and systematic method of study, as well as his intellectual rigor, gave Torah scholarship new meaning and vitality. The Maimonides Day School which he found in Boston in 1937, one of the few of its kind outside of New York, was an overwhelming success.

In the book under review, 13 well-known disciples and educators discuss various facets of the Rav's personality, achievements, influence, teachings and legacy.

In 1959, after the death of Israel's Ashkenazi chief rabbi, Isaac Herzog, Rabbi Soloveitchik declined an invitation to succeed him. Though Orthodox Israelis were troubled by his refusal to join them, his American followers found it easier to understand his preference for the galut (exile) experience. His concept of exile was that it began with Adam upon his expulsion from Paradise. He believes the experience of exile to be "the essence of the Jewish people."

His famous shiurim, two- to four-hour discourses on halachic subjects, attracted surprisingly large and grateful audiences. Rabbi Yitzchak Twersky, son-in-law and former professor at Harvard, writes: "Every shiur, every speech, was crafted with consummate artistry. This is not only an expression of his literary-conceptual perfectionism, but of his realization that if he was to teach effectively, he had to contain his immense learning and unbounded creativity…He happily fused apparently limitless erudition with enthralling elegance and immense pedagogic skills."

Dr. Norman Lamm, president of Yeshiva University refers to the Rav's essay The Lonely Man of Faith, and points out that "he somehow did not fit in into any of the conventional categories."

Actually, the Rav viewed himself as a stranger in a modern society that is technical, self-centred, self-loving. He wrote: "My doctrines are not technical…My law cannot be laboratory tested. What can I say to a functional, utilitarian society?" There are many references to his feelings of loneliness and homelessness in his lectures and essays.

Almost alone among contemporary Orthodox authorities, he viewed the emergence of the State of Israel as a divine act. He saw its appearance as opening a new chapter in Jewish history, one in which Jews enter the world stage once again. He was not afraid – despite the opinions of the majority of his own distinguished family members – to identify with the goals and aspirations of religious Zionism.

Perhaps the most significant area in which he followed an independent way and diverged from other forms of Orthodoxy – especially Chassidism – was his conviction that secular knowledge and education were essential. He believed that the great thinkers of all ages had truths to teach us and were not necessarily invalid or unimportant because they derived from non-sacred sources.

The Rav opposed interfaith dialogue on matters of theology, favored Orthodox participation with other Jewish groups in areas of mutual community concern and took a resolute stand against mixed synagogue seating for men and women.

The essays, despite their reverential tone, are well written, absorbing and informative. They provide a well-rounded picture, not only of a giant of intellect and spirituality, but also of the status of modern Orthodoxy – with its major preoccupations, accomplishments and concerns for the future.

The mistrust persists

By BENJAMIN ARCHIBALD

Guest Voices

The world is still riding on a bubble. Beset by failure upon failure in the Balkans, the international community is overjoyed by the political demise of the prime minister of Israel, Benjamin Netanyahu.

Prime Minister-elect Ehud Barak has renewed hope among foreign policy advisers in Canada, the United States and Europe, that a foreign policy success story is on the horizon: a long sought after peace accord between Palestinians and Israelis.

The yearning for peace is not rooted in a concern for Israelis or Palestinians. Peace is necessary in order to demonstrate the relevance of the enlightened west in the implementation of a cohesive foreign policy grounded on the principles of tolerance and mutual respect. But there is no cohesive foreign policy, and much like the Balkan tragedy being played out on the evening news, the Middle East will not lend itself to an easy fix peace treaty.

To the contrary, like Netanyahu before him, Barak will be faced with the substantive questions raised by the Oslo accords that were to be resolved in a spirit of trust after five years of reciprocal give and take negotiations.

These negotiations were not reciprocal, even in the time of the martyred prime minister Yitzhak Rabin. Israel gave up territory and exposed itself to deep internal soul searching vis-a-vis the Palestinians, while terror rose to unprecedented levels on the streets of Tel Aviv, which in turn led to interminable closures of the West Bank and Gaza, effectively destroying the already fragile Palestinian economy.

Five years later, the mistrust persists. The average Palestinian sees little difference between the centre-left Labor party and the centre-right Likud party. This segment of the population has seen its economic position worsen over the past five years, and has reaped little more than symbolic benefits from the Oslo accords.

Similarly, the average Israeli sees little difference between Chairman Yasser Arafat and Hamas. Over the past five years, Arafat has referred to bus bombers as holy warriors and called for a Jihad on Jerusalem. How can the veil of mistrust be lifted in less than a year?

Achieving peace between Palestinians and Israelis may very well be as hopeless as Netanyahu's administration suggested. This is likely one of the contributing factors of his political demise.

Three years ago, Netanayahu was elected by Israel's swing voters situated in the centre on the political spectrum. Incensed by the unabated Hamas terror attacks, the centre rejected the Oslo model and elected a Likud led government promising peace with security.

The past three years have demonstrated that Israelis may have only one choice: peace or security. This is Barak's challenge. He must make both the Palestinians and the world understand that Israel's minimum demands will not include a retreat to pre-1967 armistice lines.

Similarly, Arafat will try to persuade Europe and the west, as he has been doing quite successfully of late, that at a minimum, Jerusalem must become a bi-national capital and the Palestinians are entitled to all the trappings of statehood including a military force.

Netanyahu inherited Oslo just as the difficult issues came to the fore. What remains to be seen, however, is whether Netanyahu was the enemy of peace or conversely if the Israeli and Palestinian minimalist positions are irreconcilable. Ultimately, the issues of Jerusalem, borders, refugees and statehood cannot be solved in a marathon Let's make a Deal conference.

Conversely, Barak and Arafat must present, argue and debate their positions on the merits of the facts on the ground and the need of both peoples to uncover some kind of modus vivendi. Talk of unilateralism on the one hand and annexation on the other will not achieve the result the international community craves.

Cold Shabbat lunch is perfect for those hot days

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

A cold Shabbat lunch is perfect at this time of year.

Salads are great, but iceberg and romaine week after week can be boring, so can the same chicken, fish or deli. Think how much better it would be if you could create exciting salads that incorporate meat or fish, and have everyone clamoring for an invitation.

You can always double or triple the following recipes, and you can usually change the meat in any recipe to grilled or poached fish. Just make sure that if you're going from fish to meat that you have the appropriate pareve substitutes for the sour cream.

Here are some hints for making an easy special salad: You can jazz up your favorite coleslaw with a little fruit juice, or use flavored fruit or herb vinegar in your dressing in place of the usual wine vinegar. A dash of balsamic vinegar over mixed berries and tossed greens is perfect to serve with a grilled chicken breast or salmon steak.

If you don't have time to make a salad from scratch, improve on your favorite deli potato salad by adding chopped sweet pickles, red or green peppers, cucumbers, hard cooked eggs, cheese, or herbs such as dill or parsley.

When making potato salad, marinate still-warm potatoes in a little vinegar and oil; this will add flavor to the finished salad. Or dress the potatoes while still quite warm, then refrigerate to cool quickly.

If making pasta salad, cook until al dente; the pasta will then be able to absorb some of the dressing and remain firm.

When using long noodles, rinse with cold water to remove excess starch to prevent clumping.

To mix greens with less mess, refrigerate in a plastic bag. When ready to serve, toss with the dressing in the bag, then transfer to individual serving plates.

SMOKED TURKEY WITH ASPARAGUS SALAD

½ lb asparagus cut in 2-in. pieces
2 cups strawberries, halved
1½ cups smoked turkey breast, cubed
1 can pineapple tidbits in juice (8 oz), drained, reserve juice
¼ cup reserved juice
2 tbsp honey
1 tsp oil

Boil or steam asparagus until crisp tender. Drain and cool. Combine the cooled asparagus, strawberry halves, turkey, and pineapple tidbits in a medium bowl. In a bowl, whisk together the reserved pineapple juice, honey, and oil. Pour dressing mixture over the salad and toss gently. Serves 4.

CASHEW SALAD WITH SALMON

⅓ cup sugar
⅓ cup vinegar
1 tsp dried mustard
1 clove garlic, finely chopped
1 tsp celery seed
salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste equal parts fresh raw spinach and leaf lettuce, enough to serve 6 to 8
1 cup cashews, or more to taste
6 to 8 grilled salmon steaks

Grill the salmon steaks with a little salt and pepper until done. Set aside to cool (this can be done 1 to 2 days ahead.) Combine the sugar, vinegar, mustard, garlic, celery seed, salt and pepper in a bowl, and whisk until combined. Toss the greens in the dressing and place on individual serving plates. Place the salmon on top of the greens and then sprinkle with the cashews and serve immediately. Serves 6 to 8.

CHINESE CHICKEN-NOODLE SALAD

4 oz angel hair pasta uncooked
1 cup (½-in.) diagonally sliced fresh snow peas
2 cups shredded cooked chicken breast (approx. ¼ lb)
½ cup diced red bell pepper
¼ cup sliced green onions
1 medium cucumber, peeled, halved lengthwise, and sliced – about ¼ cup
3 tbsp low sodium teriyaki sauce
2 tbsp rice vinegar
2 tsp sesame seeds toasted
1 tsp dark sesame oil
½ tsp salt
¼ tsp pepper

Break pasta into 5-inch pieces. Cook in boiling water 2 minutes. Add the snow peas and cook an additional minute. Drain and rinse under cold, running water; drain well. Combine pasta mixture, chicken, and the onions, peppers and cucumbers in a bowl; set aside. Combine teriyaki sauce, rice vinegar, sesame seeds, sesame oil and salt and pepper in a bowl; stir well. Pour the dressing over the pasta mixture and toss well. Serve at room temperature or chilled. 4 1-½ cup servings.

SALMON OVER WHITE & BLACK BEAN SALSA

1 lb salmon fillets
1 cup canned black beans, drained
1 cup canned white navy beans, drained
¾ cup chopped tomatoes
¼ cup chopped red onions
½ cup chopped green bell peppers
¼ cup chopped fresh cilantro
½ tsp minced garlic
¼ cup balsamic vinegar
2 tbsp lemon juice (fresh)

Salsa: Combine the beans, peppers, tomatoes, onions, and cilantro in a bowl. In another bowl whisk together the vinegar, lemon juice, and garlic. Pour the vinaigrette over the bean mixture and toss. Barbecue the fish or bake uncovered at 425 for approximately 10 minutes for each 1-inch thickness of fish, or until the fish flakes with a fork. Serve the fish over the bean salsa. The fish can be served either hot or cold so this is perfect to make ahead if you're looking for a cool dish. Makes 4 servings.

GARDEN TUNA SALAD

1 6-oz can water-packed tuna, drained, flaked
1 large tomato, chopped
1 medium cucumber, peeled, seeded, chopped
1 small red bell pepper, chopped
½ cup chopped green onions
2 celery stalks, chopped
4 oz (about 1 cup) small shell pasta, cooked
6 tbsp (or more) prepared ranch-style salad dressing
3 tbsp chopped fresh dill or 1 tbsp dried dill

Combine first tuna, tomato, cucumber, bell pepper, green onion and celery in large bowl. Mix in the pasta. Add dressing and dill and blend well. Season salad to taste with salt and pepper. (Salad can be prepared up to 2 days ahead but best if made the night before using). Cover and refrigerate. Adjust salad with more dressing if desired and serve.
Serves 4.

This is not a comprehensive listing of the synagogues in the Greater Toronto area. The information is provided by the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto and the Toronto Board of Rabbis. The Vaad and the Board will periodically revise the listings. For statutory holidays, please call the Synagogue for any changes in times.

Help us move into our new home.

The new Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, and The Centre for Neurovascular Disorders is going up.

It's going up at a tremendous pace.

The concrete shell of the building is complete. Anticipation is building. The walls of resident rooms are going up, the plumbing's going in and the wiring is being installed. Residents are looking forward to moving into a new facility that's much better equipped to meet the needs of seniors.

And their anticipation will be rewarded. The rooms will be bigger, and all rooms will be private. Each room will have an entrance foyer and an ensuite washroom almost twice as large as in the current building.

This excellent new facility has been made possible by the generosity of our community. It's a wonderful achievement. If you have made a gift, please accept our thanks. If you haven't, please consider making a contribution to the ongoing work of one of the finest seniors' facilities anywhere.

For more information on how you can be part of completing the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, and the Centre for Neurovascular Disorders, call Shirley Worth in the Baycrest Centre Foundation at (416) 785-2500, Ext. 2013.

Wexler Praises Community

The man who headed the $950 million dollar Operation Exodus Campaign in the United States says thousands of Jews are still waiting to be rescued from the former Soviet Union (FSU) and other trouble spots around the world. Operation Exodus launched the massive emigration of Jews from the FSU to Israel in 1989.

"Just last month more than 4,000 Jews applied for Israeli visas in Moscow in only one week," reports Richard Wexler, Immediate Past National Chairman of the American United Jewish Appeal, which has since merged with other Jewish organizations to become United Jewish Communities. As many as 60,000 Jewish men, women and children are expected to leave the FSU for Israel by the end of this year due to rising anti-Semitism and economic uncertainty in the region.

"They're counting on us to help get them out," Wexler told 100 leading UJA Federation supporters during a recent visit to Toronto. "As Jews we have a responsibility to make sure Israel is ready to take these people in."

The event was held at the home of Penny and Martin Offman.

According to Wexler, the Jewish Agency, UJA Federation's overseas partner, will require an additional $30 million to finance the aliyah of 11,000 FSU Jews already underway, the transportation and absorption of 3,500 Quara Jews from Ethiopia and the cost of airlifting and settling Jewish and Muslim Kosovar refugees in Israel.

"Your giving has always extended beyond your backyard to the far reaches of the Jewish world," Wexler told a group of leading philanthropic families at the Hineni level who gathered to celebrate the success of the first year of UJA Federation's Campaign for Fifty. Mel Wolfond, who is chairing the upcoming Campaign 2000 with David Engel, called Toronto's Jewish community "amazingly generous" and pledged to build on last year's success.

Larry Tanenbaum and Brent Belzberg, recognized for heading last year's record-breaking $40.5 campaign, were among 16 former UJA Federation campaign chairs in attendance. "Toronto's Jewish community is legendary for its commitment to tzedakah and its tradition of passing on this commitment from one generation to another," Wexler added.

volunteer views

Jacquie Oppenheimer and her four-legged friend Chammie (short for Champagne) are giving volunteer teamwork new meaning.

Once a week, Oppenheimer, and her four-year-old collie visit clients at the Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre, operated by Reena, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency. Whether out for a walk, a frolic in the park or a quite cuddle, Chammie, with Oppenheimer nearby, has been lifting the spirits of many physically and developmentally challenged Reena clients for well over a year.

Oppenheimer says Chammie's caring canine qualities were evident ever since she brought her home from the animal rescue mission. "I could tell by her affectionate manner that she was destined for higher things."

"Most of the people we visit respond very warmly when Chammie extends her paw or nuzzles up for a kiss," says Oppenheimer. "She even has special permission to jump up on some of the kids. You can just see the smiles appear on their faces as she enters the room."

"I feel very proud to be able to share this important work with Chammie."

UJA Grants Benefit Singles and Young Adults

What do Bible study classes for women have in common with Jewish counter-missionary seminars and educational programming for Jewish singles? They all rank high on the list of priorities for UJA Federation's Jewish continuity initiative which recently awarded over $200,000 to eight local Jewish organizations.

Jews for Judaism's Julius Ciss says education is the best prevention against the efforts of the Christian missionary movement.

Programs for Jewish singles, university students and recent graduates were among the top three groups to receive funding. "We're looking to fill some of the programming gaps within the community," explains Zac Kaye, Director of Jewish Campus Services (JCS).

In addition to expanding its activities to more college campuses, JCS will use part its grant to fund programs specifically geared to post graduate students. Kaye says while undergraduates can choose from a variety of cultural and educational activities, 22 – 30 year old adults often feel cut off. "We get a lot of calls from people saying 'what about us,'" notes Kaye.

The Bloor Jewish Community Centre (BJCC), the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) and Kolel: A Centre for Jewish Learning are stepping up efforts to attract singles, many of whom live in the community's downtown core. "It's very important that we reach out and find exciting ways of engaging this highly under-serviced group," says Rabbi Jeremy Schwartz, Assistant Director at Kolel.

Other grant recipients include the Mekorot Institute of Torah Study for Women, UJA Federation's York Region office, Israel Experience programs and Jews For Judaism, the largest Jewish counter-missionary group in Canada. "UJA Federation's support is critical in helping us monitor and combat the activities of 40 Jews for Jesus missionary groups in Ontario alone," says Director Julius Ciss. Organization activities include one-on-one counseling, seminars, publications and lectures. "By supporting us, UJA Federation is ensuring Jewish survival," Ciss adds.

In the last three years, UJA Federation has provided over $500,000 to dozens of community organizations offering innovative programming to promote and strengthen Jewish identity.

Home At Last

jewish toronto

In the next few months thousands of Quara Jews from Ethiopia will be brought to Israel on Jewish Agency flights. In a telephone interview with jewish toronto one of the first Jews to arrive expresses hope for the future.

Amera Taibbebu waited his whole life to come home. Now, after a tumultuous journey, which included seven years in an Ethiopian refugee camp and one devastating delay after another, he has finally made it.

Twenty-two year old Taibbebu and his family were among the first of 3,000 Quara Jews from Ethiopia who began arriving in Israel two months ago. The Jewish Agency, funded by the worldwide UJA Federation network, has arranged for two weekly flights to bring Jews from Addis Ababa to Israel in order to complete the evacuation by mid-August. Close to 400 Jews have already joined 60,000 Jews of Ethiopian origin living in Israel.

At the current rate, the Jewish Agency expects to obtain aliyah approval for another 1,000 Quara Jews housed in the Gondar refugee camps who will make their way to Addis Ababa over the next two weeks.

"I've waited my whole life to return to Israel," says Taibbebu, whose broken English stifled his intense emotion during a recent telephone interview from the Mevaseret Tzion absorption centre outside Jerusalem. Back in his famine-stricken African country, Taibbebu, who holds a diploma in mathematics, was barely able to feed his family on the meager salary he earned as a garment worker. Now hopeful about his family's future, Taibbebu is eager to begin a new life. "I thank God that we are here."

Together with his wife and two young daughters, Taibbebu plans to join relatives in Beersheva and Ashdod after completing Hebrew language and training classes.

Tziki Aud, director of absorption operations at Mevaseret Tzion, says the current situation is ideal for the new arrivals from Quara. "Many already have family members living in Israel so they can draw upon their experience and knowledge during the transition period," he explains. "It also instills a greater sense of mutual responsibility among the Ethiopians."

At the Jewish Agency's Nurit absorption centre in Beersheva, five out of six staff members, including three translators, are Ethiopian.

"This wave of immigration is going extremely well because we are able to bridge the cultural gap," adds Jewish Agency spokesman Michael Jankelowitz.

Each year the UJA Federation funded Jewish Agency invests approximately $26 million in programs for Ethiopian immigrants.

The smiles on the faces of these two young girls who were among the first Quara Jews to arrive in Israel, tell the whole story.

Record Year for Israel Experience

The number of Canadian high school and university students participating in Israel Experience programs, subsidized in part by UJA Federation, has tripled in the last three years.

Thanks to the commitment and generosity of Anne Tanenbaum and other community leaders, a record 1,800 young Jewish adults from across the country are taking part in a wide range of summer programs in Israel offered through the Canada Israel Experience Centre (CIEC).

Leora Sass of London, Ontario, shares a moment of pre-flight excitement with Tanenbaum.

Photos: Signature Photography

Last week, Tanenbaum, who contributed $1 million toward Israel Experience programs, met with some of the 350 students benefiting from her generosity at Toronto's Pearson Airport. Tanenbaum was greeted by dozens of excited students who thanked her for helping make their dreams of going to Israel come true.

"We all appreciate how much Anne has done to enrich our Jewish learning at home and in Israel," said CHAT student Joanna Davidson.

"This is a very important part of their Jewish education," said Tanenbaum who, through a partnership with UJA Federation, recently donated $3 million to build CHAT's new Anne and Max Tanenbaum Education Centre. "I'm absolutely thrilled to see how many young people want to go to Israel and I am so happy to help make this possible."

In addition to the support of individual donors, CIEC Director Liz Sokolsky credits the climb in numbers to financial assistance provided by UJA Federation and UIA Federations Canada.

"Providing an Israel experience to as many of our youth as possible is a very important priority in our community," says Glennie Lindenberg, Chair of UJA Federation's Jewish continuity initiative, which funds up to 50% of program costs for hundreds of students in need. UJA Federation also funds special Israel experience scholarships for high school and university students demonstrating outstanding leadership qualities.

Brantford struggles to maintain Jewish life

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

BRANTFORD, ONT. — Contrary to what some people suspect, Mindy Sherman did not put her husband up to taking over the presidency of the synagogue in this small town a 75-minute drive southwest of Toronto.

Unlike his wife – who is treasurer of Hadassah-WIZO's Brantford-based Sharon chapter and a board member of the synagogue – Arthur Sherman isn't a joiner, he told The CJN at the auto parts store his late father and grandfather established in 1929.

But Sherman refused to accept that the resignation of his predecessor last fall might mean the closing of Beth David Congregation – and the end of Brantford's organized Jewish community, which dates back more than a century.

The community, according to Sherman, 53, is "kind of like the lamp at Chanukah time," referring to the Maccabee-era lamp that lasted eight days on a modicum of oil.

"We had a really good community, but it's coming to an end," he said. Today there are 28 local families affiliated with the synagogue. At its height there were about 150.

For the most part, Sherman's generation went where their professions took them or moved to their spouses' hometowns, he said. Their parents, in many cases, followed.

"We thought we were going to have to close the synagogue, because there's not very many people left, and the resources were down to nil," said Sherman.

He expects the synagogue – named for David Axler, a member of the Royal Canadian Air Force who died in World War II – will eventually come under the wing of a congregation elsewhere.

In Brantford, services are now held only on the High Holy Days and for special occasions, like a recent bat mitzvah. Men and women sit in wooden pews on either side of a mechitzah.

Rabbi William Eisenstein, principal of the Hamilton Hebrew Academy has been serving the community, a half-hour drive from Hamilton, for almost a decade.

Among his predecessors, when the community could support a full-time rabbi, was the late Rabbi Gedalia Felder, who served in the late 1940s.

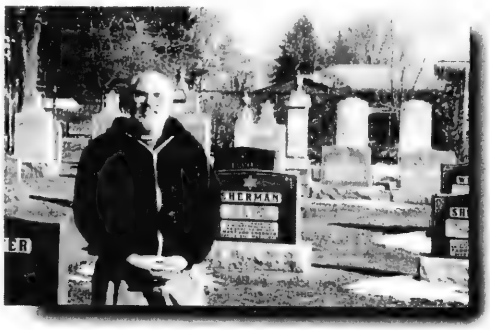
Rabbi Eisenstein conducts funerals and High Holy Day services, presides over bar and bat mitzvahs and visits the elderly.

On Sunday mornings during the school year he can be found teaching in the synagogue basement. A typical class might have eight children and four sets of parents from Brantford and surrounding towns.

"Okay guys," Rabbi Eisenstein says, snapping his fingers. "Let's get through this quickly."

An enthusiastic teacher with 38 years' experience, he gives plenty of reinforcement, ruffling a child's hair affectionately and offering lollipops at the end of class. "Beautiful!" he says in response to a correct answer.

"I love teaching," he told The CJN. "What you try to do is give [the students] a love and a pride in being Jewish." His goal is to whet their appetite for Jewish learning.



Allan Norris is in charge of the Jewish cemetery.

Ultimately, he hopes the children will marry Jewish, he said.

The comment was his only reference to intermarriage, albeit an oblique one, until he was asked about the issue.

"The families consider themselves Jewish and want their children to be Jewish," Rabbi Eisenstein said, referring to some couples with only one Jewish (or halachically Jewish) partner.

As an Orthodox rabbi, he doesn't recognize Reform conversions that have taken place within the community.

"But I'm not judgmental," he said. "I'm there to teach. I care about being sympathetic to their needs. When the tough decisions have to be made, they'll be made later on."

Allan Norris, 47, whose sons Sam, 11, and Jake, 8, underwent Reform conversions, says Judaism would have "a lot less hassles if there were more Rabbi Eisensteins around."

Norris believes that without Rabbi Eisenstein, there wouldn't be a Jewish community in Brantford.

Norris' wife Deborah, who has a doctorate in biochemistry, is not Jewish, but has been involved with Hadassah-WIZO. She and Allan coordinate the Jewish component of an annual multicultural display seen by almost 800 schoolchildren at the Brant County Museum.

She also goes into her sons' school, where they are the only Jewish students, to give presentations about Jewish holidays. Last year she joined other parents in making latkes at the Hebrew school Chanukah party.

To her surprise, more than 50 people attended. "We had some new families move into the area, and there's a whole family converting," she said. "It was just so nice."

An American who once lived in Toronto, Deborah, 46, said that although Brantford's downtown is "dreary, there are big old homes and a lot of parks. We're the 'best bloomin' city in Canada.' That's our motto."

Rabbi William Eisenstein and some of his students, (from left) Sam and Jake Norris, Alex Fuller, Joseph and Eric Yelle, Jennifer Book and her cousin from Toronto, Shoshana Erlich.

It's a nice town in which to raise kids, agreed Allan, but it doesn't have much to offer Jewishly.

Allan, Sherman's predecessor, served as shul president for more than six years, and is the longtime cemetery custodian.

He moved to Brantford from Kitchener as a teenager. In the mid-1970s he spent four years in the Middle East and Asia, studying Buddhism along the way.

He returned to Brantford in 1980 to co-run a family business, Brantford Iron & Metal.

But he carves out time whenever a death occurs to ensure the right plot is prepared, organize a minyan, and even cover the grave.

He has also, on occasion, had to deal with vandalism, although he's not convinced it is anti-Semitic.

There have been isolated anti-Semitic incidents in Brantford, a town of over 85,000 people. Most recently there were anti-Jewish/anti-fur signs placed just north of town last fall. Although the case has not been closed, it appears to be the work of a local individual.

The cemetery, like the synagogue, is Orthodox, Allan noted. A section, as yet unused, has been set aside for members of the community who are not Jewish according to halachic standards.

"I'm by far not an Orthodox Jew," Allan said. "To me my Judaism is a family, traditional thing and not so much a spiritual thing, but I'm still trying to impart Judaism to my boys. They're very proud that they're Jews."

When he and Sherman were youngsters, the Brantford Jewish community was thriving. Local Jews like to point out that their congregation predates Hamilton's.

Services were held in private homes from approximately the turn of the century, and the congregation was incorporated in 1911.

"At one time, we were quite a community," said Sherman.

In fact, his uncle, Max Sherman, was the first Jew to be elected to a political position in Brantford.

A former mayor (from 1957 to 1958), Sherman was Brantford's Citizen of the Year in 1965.

Now 84, Max retired from politics as a city councillor only last year, and is active in more than half a dozen organizations.

City Hall's foyer was recently named in his honor, and a local street, Sherman Drive, is also named after him. (Another local thoroughfare, the Wayne Gretzky Parkway, celebrates Brantford's most famous citizen.)

A native of Toronto, Max moved to Brantford in 1938 to convalesce from tuberculosis at the Brantford Sanitorium. At the time he had a 6-month-old daughter, and his in-laws, who lived in Hamilton, had a business in Brantford.

His political career included a brush with anti-Semitism when he was invited by a friend to join the Brantford chapter of an international service organization in the 1950s.

"They're not going to accept me," Sherman predicted correctly.

"But you're the mayor," answered the friend.

After he was blackballed, Sherman received a letter from within the organization acknowledging that anti-Semitism was involved and apologizing for "members of this ilk."

But Sherman didn't admit the reason for the blackball publicly, thinking it could harm the Jewish community in Brantford and other locations.

Today there are no barriers to any ethnic group interested in joining an organization, said Max. "It's a good town to live in."

Unlike some of his contemporaries, Max, a great-grandfather and second-time widower, is staying in Brantford. "My roots are too deep. I figured I'd be happier here."

The bleak facade of his now empty hardware store on Brantford's main street – and other stores like it – attest to economic difficulties the city has experienced.

Arthur Sherman, seen here in his auto parts shop, stepped in as synagogue president last fall.

Ontario town 'a wonderful community'

(Many Toronto readers, by the way, may associate the name Sherman's Hardware with Max's father, Ben, who lived to age 111.)

Although Brantford's economy has suffered, at least one member of the Jewish community – an accountant with an aversion to being quoted by name – speaks in positive terms about the town's prospects. He said Brantford "is on the verge of an economic rebirth."

This fall, in fact, both a casino and a small satellite campus of Wilfrid Laurier University will open in the downtown area.

Two telecommunications companies that will employ 1,300 people between them have also moved to town, said David Amos, director of Brantford's Economic Development department.

The city's unemployment rate has dropped to seven percent from 15 percent at the beginning of 1997, he added.

During the Jewish community's heyday, Max was an active participant. He served as MC at the opening of the synagogue's new building in 1948, and is a former chair of B'nai Brith's Brantford lodge, which hasn't been active since 1974.

Max remembers the Torah procession from the original 1915 synagogue – a house on Palace Street where the Jewish stars are still visible on the windows – to the red brick building around the corner on Waterloo Street, just blocks from downtown.

Jerry Miller, a second-generation Brantford lawyer who lives outside the city, misses the "active, vibrant" Jewish community in which he was raised.

Through the local Jewish youth group, Miller spent time with his counterparts locally and in communities like Galt, Guelph, Kitchener and Waterloo.

"When I was a kid, [maybe] half the merchants downtown were Jewish. Now I don't think there's one Jewish business downtown. Of my parents' friends, 80 to 90 percent were Jewish in this community. They had an affinity."

Miller experienced little anti-Semitism personally, but it did exist, he said. His friends were both Jewish and non-Jewish.

"Although our parents did not dictate [that we marry Jewish], it was understood that it was preferable," he said.

He is now married for the second time, and his wife is not Jewish. One of his four daughters married a non-Jew, "a very decent fellow," said Miller.

Former mayor Max Sherman reminisces over a scrapbook made for him by a family member.

A former synagogue president, Miller now affiliates with Beth Jacob Congregation, the Conservative synagogue in Hamilton, but attended Beth David last fall because he thought it would be the Brantford congregation's final year.

He has filled his life with other things to compensate, he said. "I had to be a realist."

The earliest Jewish pioneers, most of whom were Russian, settled in Brantford in 1881, but it wasn't until 1912 that the Jewish community acquired its own cemetery, thanks largely to the efforts of Frederick Strenkovsky.

In the early days of the century when Strenkovsky peddled in the area with his father and brother, he came across a Christian cemetery with stones bearing names he believed were Jewish, recalled his daughter Lena Rothberg, 81.

"It became an obsession with him to bring what he knew of Judaism to a smaller centre," Rothberg said over lunch at the home she and her husband Murray have shared for over 50 years.

Rothberg is a past national president of Hadassah-WIZO. The local Brantford chapter, which now holds membership meetings only once a year, has almost two dozen members ranging in age from early 40s to over 80.

The chapter, the third established in Canada, was started 80 years ago to help with the war effort. Members celebrated the landmark anniversary last fall.

Rothberg, whose mother was a charter member of the chapter, has her own Judaic mission, born of an incident which took place almost 70 years ago when a teacher "ridiculed" her for missing an exam that fell on a Jewish holiday.

"I promised myself that when I grew up, I was going to do something about promoting Judaism so people would understand we were people like they were."

Rothberg's closest childhood friend was the daughter of an Anglican minister. But growing up in an observant home, her Jewish identity was very strong. Her father, who eventually went into the surgical supplies business with two brothers, had rabbinic smichah from Russia.

Lena and her four siblings attended cheder. Children of all ages learned together, the boys separated from the girls.

The Strenkovskys used to travel to Toronto to stock up on kosher meat for the winter, Rothberg recalls. "We had what was called a summer kitchen, but it was really a winter kitchen."

She met Murray, a native of Melbourne, Australia, when he was stationed in the area as a pilot instructor during World War II.

He sought out the small Brantford synagogue where he attended a service. "An elderly gentleman asked me if I'd like an aliyah," he recalled, "and one of the young men invited us to go to an evening. The young ladies in town were entertaining the air force and the army. I met Lena at this party, and I saw her right away."

Now the grandparents of six, Lena and Murray had to work to create a Jewish environment for their two daughters.

"We drove our kids around to neighboring cities [for activities with other Jewish youth]," recalls Lena. "We had a very active sisterhood at that time. We learned to be caterers at our shul. We had a Jewish hockey team. We had a marvellous youth program."

Mindy Sherman, left, and Lena Rothberg share a deep commitment to the Jewish community.

Both their daughters married Jewish men, and are involved in their respective Jewish communities.

Rothberg's sister-in-law, Sadie Stren, 84, who now lives in Toronto, has become the Brantford Jewish community's historian and archivist.

"It was such a good place in which to live," she said. The community's decline merely paralleled that of small communities worldwide, she added.

Although many community members have left Brantford, Mindy Sherman, 52, did the reverse, moving to Brantford from Toronto when she married Arthur 21 years ago.

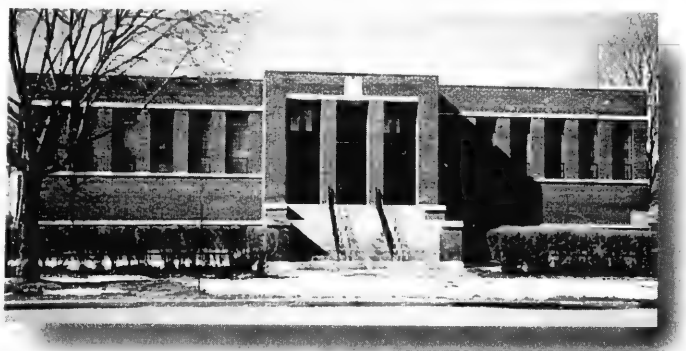
She was raised in a traditional home, but did not take an active role Jewishly until she was asked to handle gift cards for Hadassah-WIZO in Brantford.

"We've been lucky to have [Mindy]," said Lena, who takes great pride in the community.

"It's a wonderful community, a warm community," said Rabbi Eisenstein, but he sees nothing to keep Jewish people there.

Last year, when Allan Norris was still president, the synagogue's boiler broke down. "I was here every six hours draining the place," he said.

"My guess is, when the roof goes, the shul will go, and when the shul goes, I figure so does the community. That's why I always tried to keep the shul going. I think whatever identity is left here is right in this building."



Jewish life in Brantford once revolved closely around Beth David Congregation, built in 1948. [Frances Kraft photos]

94-year-old graduates

By ABIGAIL PICKUS
JUF News

CHICAGO — The calls keep coming in for Sam Janus.

The mayor of Lincolnwood's office is asking him to give a talk, and reporters for papers large and small, are requesting interviews.

But lately Janus has to turn them down.

"I have a lot of work to do," he says, gesturing to a pile of research books on his dining room table for his yet-unfinished paper, which he has to hand in before his graduation from Oakton Community College.

At age 94, it's no wonder Janus has been the focus of so much media attention.

"It isn't anything new, I've been written up before. What do you expect, an old man, like me, going back to school," he says, from his spacious one-bedroom apartment – his self-dubbed "bachelor pad" – in Lincolnwood Place, a Jewish retirement home. He settled there seven years ago after the death of his wife of 60 years.

Like many Jewish immigrants who arrived here from Eastern Europe around the beginning of this century, Janus had to plunge straight into the working world after grammar school – in his case, it was Washburne Grammar School, from which he graduated in 1918 at age 14.

But after a lifetime of work – in men's furnishings for over a decade and then selling jewelry for another 40 years, Janus decided to do what working life had never allowed him to do: go back to school.

"I've always admired people who had an education. I wanted to follow in their footsteps," he says.

Which was why, at the age of 82, he completed his high school equivalency from Truman College, and went on to work toward his associate's degree in liberal arts from Oakton.

Janus took one course a quarter for nine years to obtain his associate's degree. Ever the optimist, he is now planning to attend Northeastern University in the fall, to finally get that college degree.

"So, what do you want to know? Shoot," Janus asks.

After all, he has lived through nearly an entire century.

Back to school

In 1912, at the age of 7, Janus came to Chicago from Ukraine with his father, who was avoiding being drafted into the Russo-Japanese War. They sailed steerage class in a boat that took more than three weeks to cross the ocean.

His family – they later sent for his mother and young brothers – eventually settled in the Maxwell-Street area, the "Jewish ghetto." They lived in a fourth-floor walk-up with no bath. To wash up, they had go down the block and use the public bathhouse.

To chronicle everything he's lived through, or to talk about how the world has changed over the past 90 years, is not something Janus has time to do, especially with his paper on the 20th century's impact on the environment, looming over his head.

"If I were to give you the details of how I got here and why it would take all afternoon," he says.

Yet, pulling out a paper assignment he wrote on the history of the 20th century, he says, "I've lived through most of it," referring to Prohibition (the period when he met his wife, Rae) and Al Capone, and everything else on up.

While he says he's tried to stay out of politics, he admits that he's always been an "extreme liberal...I'm for the underdog."

And he's always been a sports enthusiast.

He still works out three times a week at the Bernard Horwich JCC in West Rogers Park, lifting weights and keeping fit the old-fashioned, calisthenics way.

He even taught an exercise class there not long ago, before people started to drop off, he says. "They started to die, or move to Florida."

Exercising is just par for the course for this former amateur boxer.

"I weighed 135 pounds. then and weigh 135 now," he says, which is evident. Short and trim, and wearing thick glasses, he still cuts a dapper figure, impeccably dressed in a checked shirt and gray dress pants.

As far as this world of ours goes – a techno-savvy, violent, often ruthless world – Janus has no answers.

"It was a much better world when I got here. We didn't have the turmoil, the killings. When I was 14, we'd get into fights, but we didn't use guns," he says.

And when it comes to the what-can-you-teach-us-about-life questions – those hackneyed sound bites seniors are often asked to produce – Janus can only shrug.

"Advice? We're all put together in such different ways," he finally manages. "A lot of people don't get along with anyone. I'm an extrovert, I make friends very easily, I'm always kibitzing and joking."

If a secret to Janus' life must be extracted, humor and affability are certainly it. Forget Dale Carnegie, this man is a natural at making friends and influencing people. And he's a big joke-teller, often delivering his punch lines completely poker-faced, with only the twinkle in his eye giving it away.

"You can't take me seriously," he says, if you take a joke at face value.

Wordplays are his speciality, including a few groaners. But it's worth it to stick around for the spontaneous quips. Like his response to whether he's planning a party for his graduation. "Sure," he says, without missing a beat.

"I've hired out the Chicago stadium."

Beneath the humor, however, Janus reveals a questioning soul, one that stands before God and implores, why?

"Often times I wonder, where is the justice? Here I am alive, and my two younger brothers are gone," he says.

Facing the end of his life, Janus doesn't seem to want to weigh himself down with such overwhelming questions, he says. After all, he has his family nearby – a daughter and son-in-law, four grandchildren, and five great-grandchildren.

He also has his studying, his excursions to the library to "dig" for books, his workouts, and, ultimately, his joy of life, he adds.

"I'm not afraid to die," he says. "I've lived a long life. I'm very fortunate. I have things to look forward to.

"You must remember, I am now living on bonus years – my plans are from day to day. I'm fortunate to go to the gym and take workouts, and I hope to stay healthy until I check out."

Israeli Consul completing term

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Israeli Consul Chen Ivri will be completing his three-year term in Canada and returning to Israel at the beginning of August.

Ivri's role has included assisting the ambassador in a variety of areas and representing him in his absence. Primarily, Ivri developed and strengthened political ties between Canada and Israel, working with our Ministry of Foreign Affairs and other government departments.

The establishment of a friendship group with Canadian MPs has been one of Ivri's accomplishments.

MPs have been invited to the ambassador's residence to hear lecturers from Israel on a variety of topics and to participate in discussions in many fields.

In addition, Ivri helped organize delegations of Canadians, both politicians and academics, who were sent to Israel to see what the country is all about.

Ivri remembers the excitement of his arrival in Canada in July, 1996, when, after only two days in the country, he was part of the delegation which signed the Free Trade Agreement between Canada and Israel.

"I am going home with a very good feeling," he says. "Many things have been achieved in these years, the Free Trade Agreement being perhaps the most important."

During Ivri's term, there have been formal dialogues between the Israeli and Canadian foreign affairs ministries. Agreements were signed in areas such as culture and social security.

Ivri has also forged close ties with the various Jewish organizations and has made friends both in Ottawa and in many of the communities he has visited, he says.

"From time to time, I travelled around to bring messages from Israel to communities all over Canada," he recalls, noting that in spite of the cold climate, he found a warm reception wherever he went.

The Ivri family has been very involved in the local Jewish community and Ivri says they will be leaving with mixed feelings. He, his wife Dalia, and their four sons have become familiar faces at many community events.

The two oldest sons have already returned to Israel, but when the rest of the family leaves they will have a daily reminder of their sojourn in Canada – the youngest son Ben was born here.

Winnipeg rabbi heads to Toronto on interim basis

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Rabbi Peretz Weizman, one of Winnipeg's senior rabbis, has accepted a position as interim spiritual leader of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation in Toronto.

Rabbi Weizman has been asked to fill a leadership role until the Toronto synagogue engages a senior rabbi for its 1,500-member families.

Thus far, he has given the Beth Emeth a commitment to stay over yom tov – at least until Sukkot – and perhaps a few weeks longer.

Rabbi Weizman has been rabbi emeritus of north Winnipeg's Bnay Abraham for the past five years. He also heads Winnipeg's Vaad Ha'ir.

A holocaust survivor from Lodz, Poland, Rabbi Weizman came to Winnipeg in 1953. He served as spiritual leader of Bnay Abraham Synagogue for 40 years. (Rabbi Louis Berkal, 85, rabbi emeritus of south Winnipeg's Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, is the only rabbi to serve Winnipeg's Jewish community longer.)

Rabbi Weizman had become known to the Beth Emeth congregation because he davens there when he visits his daughter and her family in Toronto.

On at least one occasion, he was invited by Rabbi Joseph Kelman, now rabbi emeritus of Beth Emeth, to give the sermon.

"Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda is a tremendous congregation," Rabbi Weizman says. "It will be a challenge being the rabbi, but I will do my best. I will have to provide real substance, real meat."

For the time being, the Vaad Ha'ir is considering the rabbi's time in Toronto – at least over the holiday period – as vacation time, as he usually goes away during the winter for a month or two, Rabbi Weizman says.

His son, Dr. Sam Weizman, will be filling in for him alongside Cantor Saul Fink at the Bnay Abraham this yom tov.

Jewish teachers receive three paid holy days off

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — There has been a break in the ranks of Winnipeg school divisions that have opposed paid religious leave for Jewish teachers on the High Holy Days.

Partly because of the mounting legal costs, Fort Garry School Division in southeast Winnipeg has agreed to give the division's seven Jewish teachers three paid holy days.

The same privilege will be granted to teachers of other faiths whose holy days may also fall on regular school days.

Jewish teachers throughout the public school system in Winnipeg have been fighting for five years to have days off with pay for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

With the support of the Manitoba Teachers Society, 66 Jewish teachers in four school divisions have been arguing the case in court under the Charter of Rights.

Currently, Winnipeg School Division No. 1, the city's largest school division, allows employees two days off for religious leave, while Assiniboine South School Division allows one religious day off with pay a year (as had Fort Garry). Seven Oaks School Division requires teachers taking religious leave to share the cost of a supply teacher.

The school divisions argued in court that it would be difficult to find enough substitute teachers to fill in, and that the substitute staff are frequently not as competent as the regular classroom teachers.

Resolution receives a positive response

Lastman was the grand marshal. Earlier, the quilt was on display at Dollard des Ormeaux City Hall.

"The People's Resolution is not just motherhood or an 'I love you' to Quebec. It's much deeper," said Suissa, a dentist. "It includes concrete measures to keep this country together and to respect Quebec's place in it.

"We also felt it was important that such a statement be made now during a time of relative peace, and not when there is a crisis."

The resolution was meaty enough that Edmonton actually sought a legal opinion before passing it.

Addressed to the prime minister of Canada, the minister of intergovernmental affairs, the premier of Quebec and all provincial legislatures, the resolution urges "the continuance of a united Canada in accordance with the moral, political, legal and constitutional obligations of our nation.

"We, the people, demand that the government of Canada and all provincial legislatures/assemblies ensure that any future constitutional negotiations not lead to the break-up of our country."

The resolution says the Constitution must give "the province of Quebec, a fundamental and valued partner of the Canadian confederation, the opportunity to promote and protect its culture, civil law tradition and French language."

It does not, however, accord Quebec any special or distinct status. The resolution, in fact, underscores that all provinces are equal and it also stresses the need to protect the official language of minority communities throughout Canada.

It emphasizes that "all Canadians from all provinces [should be] consulted on the issue of national unity."

The response has been very positive, Suissa said. "Some mayors have sent us letters about the French roots in their town, and associations of francophones outside Quebec are in favor of the resolution."

Makovka, a lawyer, believes this effort will show Quebecers that other Canadians do recognize their concerns, and will demonstrate to the separatists that Canadians can also get passionate about their country.

"Any decision about this country's future can't just focus on one side," Makovka said. "We believe the separatists shouldn't have it all when it comes to deciding Canada's future."

Suissa and Makovka said they think they are making an impact in Quebec. There were articles about TCU in Le Devoir and Le Journal de Montréal, and the television station RDI broadcast the organization's press conference live, during last November's provincial election.

Maritimes Chabad marks four years in region

HALIFAX — The community gathered here recently to mark four years of public service by Chabad of the Maritimes, as well as the fifth anniversary of the passing of the Lubavitcher Rebbe Menachem Mendel Schneerson.

"The success achieved has largely been due to the efforts of the many dedicated partners who have joined forces for the growth and furtherance of local Yiddishkeit," said Rabbi Mendel Feldman, regional director.

Rabbi Mendel Feldman

Speaking on behalf of the many volunteers of the local Chabad branch, Rabbi Feldman pledged to tirelessly continue their endeavors to increase Jewish awareness "through innovative activities and programs for all ages of the local Jewish community."

The guest speaker at the celebration was Rabbi Moshe New, rabbi and executive director of the Montreal Torah Centre.

"The dedicated men and women of Lubavitch have truly risen to the challenge of keeping their wonderful Rebbe's legacy of absolute and unconditional acceptance of every single Jew vibrantly alive," he said.

Rabbi New added that in the Rebbe's holistic view, "when we give generously of our time or finances, we are essentially really helping ourselves, for in truth, every Jew is an intrinsic part of the other."

After dinner, the guests saw a video that described 81 new Chabad institutions currently under contruction from Toronto to Tel Aviv.

The programs under the administration of Chabad of Halifax include a day camp, adult education programs, holiday awareness projects, kosher catering and publications.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Contrary to firmly entrenched beliefs shared by Canadians from coast to coast, parliamentarians do not sit by the pool all summer long...well, perhaps some do! For the most part, however, MPs and their colleagues in the Senate are busy with any number of projects.

One favorite summer pastime is the party "task-force." This generic initiative, often dubbed a "make work project" by the chronically cynical, finds politicians travelling around the country seeking some elusive insight into problems that they were not able to attend to during the previous parliamentary session.

This summer, the keen observer can actually detect a revealing trend. Four of the five parties represented in the House have embarked on tours aimed at improving their popularity in strategic parts of the country.

The Liberals have put together an eleven-person parliamentary task force to determine why the Natural Governing Party (NGP) cannot buy a seat west of Portage and Main. Reformers – who, as we'll see in a moment, should be preoccupied with their own problems – have taken to dogging that roaming band of Liberal troubadours, loading up town-hall meetings and clogging the local phone-in talk shows featuring Liberal guests with hostile anti-Eastern Establishment callers.

Not especially nice, but certainly very effective. At least, head of the Liberal party task force, MP John Harvard, and company, get points for honestly confronting reality. Brian Mulroney has a better chance of a speedy rehabilitation out west than does the NGP!

For their part, the Reformers are furiously treading water, going nowhere fast. Preston's forces "won" the internal party referendum on a United Alternative by the skin of their teeth, and the effort to parlay that victory into a new political machine that could credibly challenge the Liberals in Ontario is floundering.

As we have had occasion to note in the past, Manning has an awful lot riding on the success of the United Alternative. If it sinks, so does he. To stretch the swimming metaphor just a bit more, our advice to Preston is that he would do better to sign up for a Red Cross lifesaving course this summer. Both he and his party are in desperate need.

Next week, we'll look at the Tory and BQ summer revival efforts!

Tragedy brings Israelis, Palestinians together

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Two Palestinian construction workers died and nine were injured – two of them critically – when a building collapsed last week in the town of El-Bireh, on the main road linking Ramallah and Jerusalem.

Israeli rescue units were called in to help the Palestinians extricate the casualties and search for possible survivors among the ruins.

The mid-morning tragedy sent Palestinians at nearby shops running to assist, Israeli troops across the border piling into jeeps and medics from nearby Jewish settlements jumping into their ambulances.

Israeli and Palestinian security officers dressed in olive green uniforms with matching berets, formed a human chain to lift many tons of steel and concrete. The top floor of the building had collapsed during construction work.

Ambulances bearing red crescents and red stars of David hustled the injured to Palestinian and Israeli hospitals. Rescue workers – some, Israelis, veterans of last year's embassy bombings in Kenya – carefully extracted partially buried workers.

For some, it was hard to resist seeing a wider significance to the collaboration, coming just days after Israel swore in a new government dedicated to reviving peace talks with the Palestinians.

The tragedy prompted the first-ever phone call between the speakers of the two parliaments: Knesset speaker Avraham Burg called his Palestinian counterpart, Ahmed Qureia, to express his condolences.

Qureia thanked Burg for the assistance the Israelis extended – and said he hoped the phone call marked the beginning of bilateral relations between the two legislatures.

"We are all, after all, human beings," said settler spokesman Aharon Domb.

After more than five hours of work, the Israeli commander confirmed the suspicions of the searchers. "We have reached the bottom of the rubble and we haven't found anyone," said Col. Gal Hirsch.

Moshe Eisenbach, a haredi volunteer who gathers body parts for identification, said he was relieved he was left idle that day.

Abdullah phones Barak

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM —King Abdullah of Jordan called Prime Minister Ehud Barak last week to congratulate him on taking office and express satisfaction with the new government's declarations.

In the phone call, Abdullah added that Barak's words show a real intention to advance the peace process on all tracks. Abdullah also expressed his happiness at the Syrian Foreign Ministry's response to Barak's comments, and emphasized that Damascus is interested and serious about attaining peace in the region.

He said they should take advantage of the positive atmosphere in the region to move forward and establish a real peace.

In Syria, meanwhile, the media broadcast the Foreign Ministry's comments, which included a statement that Syria "shared Barak's [peace] interests," and that it would respond to Israel's every step with a step of its own.

An article in Syria's Tashrin newspaper yesterday argued that "The just and comprehensive peace is within reach if the Israeli officials maintain their stands, and translate their words into actions. We remind our readers that Syria was the one to first use the term the 'peace of the brave.'"

Meanwhile, Russia has sent its head of the Middle East division of the Foreign Ministry to the United States to meet with his counterpart in the State Department, hoping to discuss Syrian President Hafez Assad's recent visit in Russia and the U.S.'s attitude toward Syria and Russian-Syrian relations.

Israel, U.S. won't be at the table in Geneva

By JULIA GOLDMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — If representatives of 188 countries meet in Geneva on July 15, Israel will be on everyone's mind.

Israeli officials, however, won't be there.

The meeting is being convened specifically to discuss the enforcement of the Fourth Geneva Convention in "occupied Palestinian territory, including Jerusalem."

It is being organized at the request of the United Nations General Assembly, which in February, voted overwhelmingly to convene the signatories to the Convention, the treaty governing the treatment of civilians during wartime.

Of the parties to the Convention, only Israel and the United States have firmly and publicly stated that they will not participate.

Canada announced last month that it will work with Switzerland to postpone the conference. [CJN, July 1].

Canada opted to have the gathering, joining 115 other countries that voted for the Arab-sponsored resolution at the UN.

Because there is no precedent for such a conference, some of the most fundamental questions concerning its procedures and goals have yet to be answered. And it is not clear whether the conference will be held as planned.

It would be the first meeting of the parties to the Convention for any reason since the treaty was adopted in 1949.

Israel and the United States have criticized the meeting as a political manipulation of humanitarian law aimed at forcing Israel's hand on the issue of settlements.

The Palestinians have strong support from the more than 100 countries in the Non-Aligned Movement at the UN for holding the meeting.

But some European states, Germany foremost among them, are pushing for a delay, as the meeting would come just as Israel's new government is being formed.

Still, the European Union has yet to come to a consensus on the matter.

Dore Gold, Israel's UN ambassador, called the Geneva meeting "an anachronistic mechanism that singles out Israel" and ignores the "unparalleled risks" Israel has made under the Oslo peace accords.

Moreover, he said, "it destroys the foundations of international humanitarian law," most recently defended in the war in Kosovo.

Israel's opposition to the meeting also has a symbolic basis.

The Fourth Geneva Convention was adopted in the wake of World War II to protect civilians from the kinds of force, intimidation, and transfer of populations that characterized Nazi expansionist aggression.

To apply the convention today "to Israeli construction in the territories, would be singularly biased and an impediment to peace," B'nai B'rith International President Richard Heideman wrote in a June 14 letter to 188 world leaders.

Israel's outgoing ambassador to the United States, Zalman Shoval, called the planned Geneva conference "basically immoral."

Neither Labor nor Likud, he said in an interview, takes an "all or nothing" position. "It's a question of degree."

Switzerland, which is responsible for making preparations for the conference, has surveyed the parties and is organizing consultations with representatives of a select group of nations to gauge international opinion about the purpose of the meeting.

So far, a Swiss diplomatic source said, the majority response indicates clear support for the conference to be held, but little else.

Who will chair the meeting, who will pay for it and even what aim the conference is expected to achieve, all have yet to be determined.

The Palestinians recognize the uniqueness of the Geneva initiative, but Marwan Jilani, counsellor to the Palestinian observer at the UN, said that lack of precedence is no reason not to convene the parties.

"The policies and practices of the Israeli government are of serious concern to the whole international community," he said, although they "might not seem to some people as serious as what's happening in other places around the world."

Israeli settlement policies during the last three decades, he said, are "the only case of settler colonization in our present time."

The Non-Aligned Movement, representing what is taken to be the Palestinian position, has said the conference should conclude with a declaration that cites, among other points, "the existence of grave breaches and serious violations by Israel of the Fourth Geneva Convention" and the affirmation of the applicability of the Convention to "occupied Palestinian territory."

The movement is also calling for a resolution to be issued at the conference's conclusion, but how or even if such a resolution would be enforced is unclear.

Jilani said that in pressing for the meeting, the Palestinians "are not calling for sanctions against Israel, nor are we calling to establish criminal courts for Israel's pursuing policies against the Palestinian people.

"What we are saying, is that the international community has the responsibility to discourage settlements in the occupied territory."

As of July 1, the European Union was reportedly holding meetings with the Palestinians to work out a compromise that would limit the discussion to reaffirming the applicability of the Fourth Geneva Convention to the territories.

Israel maintains that those geographic areas have no current fixed legal status. The question of whether or not it is, in fact, "Palestinian," is to be determined by the Oslo peace accords.

Certainly, an Israeli diplomatic source said, Israel does not view the Har Choma neighborhood in southeastern Jerusalem as Palestinian land.

The current push for the Geneva meeting began in earnest in 1997, when the UN General Assembly – for the first time in 15 years – convened an emergency special session to discuss Israel's plans to build housing units at Har Choma, which the Palestinians call Jabal Abu Ghneim.

Palestinian riots and a terror attack on Israel followed groundbreaking at the site in March 1997, leading to an impasse in the peace process that lasted for nearly two years.

Israel and the United States say that by bringing international pressure to bear on a question intended for final-status negotiations, the Geneva meeting may serve to undermine the Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

Permanent-status negotiations are "the place where the settlements issue should be addressed," U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern Affairs Martin Indyk told reporters, "not in some international forum which doesn't have the basis in the [Geneva] Conventions for a meeting and which cannot produce a positive result by its very nature."

Israel trip opens MP's eyes

MP Daniel Turp, Bloc Québécois, said he too had "his eyes opened" as a result of this trip. He said that while Canada is only a middle power, it "should be an honest broker [in the peace process]. The contribution might be modest, but Canada could play a role, and should."

MPs Diana Ablonczy, Peter Adams and Carmen Provenzano also took part in the trip.

"Canada has to provide whatever support it can to enable the parties – Israel and its neighbors – to talk," said Moshe Ronen, CJC president, who was in attendance at the wedding of David Levy's daughter Orly last week in Petah Tikvah.

Ronen, a friend of Levy's, met with Prime Minister Ehud Barak at the wedding ceremony.

"Barak seemed quite impressed with [Prime Minister Jean] Chrétien's interest in the Middle East," Ronen reported. "We haven't seen Chrétien very active in Middle East politics, and maybe this is a signal of the kind of continuing supportive role that Canada and Chrétien want to play. I think Barak warmly received that. He told me that he felt very positive about that.

"It was a very positive exchange," said Ronen about his 15-minutes with Barak. "An interesting beginning of what I hope will be a strong relationship between Canadian Jewry and the new government, and particulary the new prime minister."

LEGAL NOTICE BY ORDER OF THE COURT

To victims of Nazi persecution and their heirs who may have claims against Swiss Banks or other Swiss entities relating to the Holocaust:

Swiss banks agreed to pay $1.25 billion U.S. dollars to settle legal claims relating to the World War II era conduct of Swiss banks, Swiss businesses, and the Swiss government ("Swiss Entities").

The United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York (the "Court") will hold a hearing on November 29, 1999, to decide whether the Settlement should be given final approval.

Note that you may be included even if you did not have a Swiss bank account, and that this Settlement is different from the Swiss Humanitarian Fund.

Who Is Affected by the Settlement

You are affected by the Settlement if you fit into one of the following five Settlement Classes. Four Classes consist of "Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution" (any individual, business or group persecuted or targeted for persecution by the Nazi Regime or its agents, because they were or were believed to be Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual, or physically or mentally disabled or handicapped), AND who:

1. Had assets on deposit with any Swiss bank, investment fund, or other custodian, prior to May 9, 1945, OR
2. May have claims against Swiss Entities relating to assets looted or taken by the Nazi Regime*, OR
3. Performed slave labor for entities that may have deposited the revenues or proceeds of that labor with or transacted that profit through Swiss Entities, OR
4. Unsuccessfully sought entry into Switzerland to avoid Nazi persecution, or after gaining entry, were mistreated, and may have related claims against any Swiss Entity.

The fifth Settlement Class includes any individual, whether or not a Victim or Target of Nazi Persecution, who performed slave labor in a work site, wherever located, owned or controlled by a Swiss Entity.

All Settlement Classes include heirs and successors of the persons and entities described above.

Even if you're not sure whether you are a member of one of the Settlement Classes, you should request a Mailed Notice and Initial Questionnaire. For example, if you performed slave labor, you may not know whether revenue or proceeds of that labor were deposited with Swiss Entities; you may still be a Settlement Class member.

How and When Claims will be Paid

No claims process or Plan of Allocation has yet been established. The Mailed Notice explains how you can make suggestions.

To receive further notice of a claims process, and ensure that you are able to file a claim, you must either mail a request for such notice to the address below, or complete and return the Initial Questionnaire attached to the Mailed Notice.

If the Court gives final approval of the Settlement, a Plan of Allocation will be adopted and the Fund will be disbursed. Not all Settlement Class members who apply will be eligible to receive payments.

If You Do Not Want to Participate

If you do not wish to participate in or be bound by the Settlement, you must exclude yourself by writing a letter so indicating, to the address given in the Mailed Notice, by October 22, 1999. If you do not, you will be barred from prosecuting any legal action against Swiss Entities relating to the settled disputes. If you exclude yourself, you will NOT be able to claim a portion of the Fund.

How to Comment or Object

You may comment on the terms of the Settlement by October 22, 1999. The Mailed Notice describes how to submit comments or objections. You have the right to appear at the November 29, 1999 hearing in person or through counsel, although you do not have to.

Who Represents You

The Court appointed attorneys as Settlement Class Counsel, and appointed Settlement Class Representatives, including Holocaust survivors, the World Jewish Restitution Organization ("WJRO"), and the World Council of Orthodox Jewish Communities. You do not have to personally pay the Court appointed attorneys. Certain attorneys will apply to the Court for reimbursement of their costs, up to about .2% of the Fund. Certain Plaintiffs' attorneys will also apply for fees, up to at most 1.8% of the Fund. The Court may award a lower amount. Most attorneys will not apply for fees, and counsel for the WJRO will not apply for fees or costs.

The Settlement of this case (In re Holocaust Victim Assets Litigation, Master File No. CV-96-4849) concludes all legal actions and disputes against Swiss Entities relating to the Holocaust, World War II, Victims or Targets of Nazi Persecution, the Nazi Regime, treatment of refugees, or any related thing. Certain claims against various Swiss insurance companies listed in the Mailed Notice are not included in this Settlement.

Signs from Syria hint at seismic shift

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Syrian leader Hafez al-Assad, who has constructed his regime based on hostility to Israel, now says he is interested in talking about peace.

Opinion

As Assad changes course, his credibility will rest on his ability to convince his political foes and his own long-suffering population that Israel is not, after all, the "spawn of the devil."

While he was apparently unable to bring himself to make these commitments to former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, who was prepared to hand back the strategically important Golan in a peace treaty, Assad now appears to believe he has more to gain than lose by making peace with Israel.

In a carefully calibrated interview with British journalist and Syria specialist Patrick Seale, Assad spoke with unprecedented warmth and enthusiasm about new Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

"He seems to be a strong and honest man," Assad said about Barak. "As the election results show, he evidently has wide support. It is clear that he wants to achieve peace with Syria. He is moving forward at a well-studied plan."

Barak, he added "is a leader who, I feel sure, can accomplish whatever he decides to do."

Writing in the London-based al-Hayat, Seale, who is regarded as Assad's unofficial spokesman in the West, said he had gained the "overwhelming impression that a genuine will for peace exists on both sides.

"Never before have Israel and Syria been so ready for a settlement," he said.

Assad's determination appeared to have been reinforced by a senior Syrian commentator, who, like Seale, used the Arabic media in London – the clearinghouse of Arab-Israeli exchanges – to send a thinly disguised message from Damascus to Jerusalem.

Writing in the Saudi-owned Asharq al-Awsat last week, Ghassan al-Imam launched a scathing attack on Iran, accusing it of attempting to sabotage the nascent Israeli-Syrian peace prospects by ordering last month's Hezbollah bombardment on northern Israel.

Not only did Imam pin the blame for the assault on Iran but he also went out of his way to clear Syria of any complicity in the Hezbollah offensive.

He also threw down a challenge to Tehran: If, in the context of peace with Israel, Iran is unable to move from a military to a moral, spiritual posture in Lebanon, Tehran will find itself in conflict with Damascus.

If Imam's charges presage the beginning of a rift in the 20-year-old alliance between secular, Arab Syria and Islamic, non-Arab Iran, analysts believe this could produce a seismic shift in the geopolitical and geostrategic dispositions of several states in the region, including Israel.

Imam said there was no doubt that the Hezbollah attack on Israel was "prompted by the Iranian leadership – most probably without prior consultation with either the Lebanese or the Syrians."

"In the past," he wrote, "Syria turned a blind eye to Iranian sponsored military activity in Lebanon, primarily because it served its own interests in undermining Israeli occupation of the south.

Not anymore, apparently.

What has caused Assad to change his mind and risk so much for a peace deal with Israel?

First, said one senior Western diplomatic source, Assad has witnessed the peace treaties between Israel and Egypt, Israel and Jordan, and now the prospect of a final settlement with the Palestinians.

"Quite simply, he does not want to be left out," said the source.

Second, without a replacement for his old Soviet patron, he recognizes that the days of closed, controlled societies are over and that Syria's survival depends on integration into the global marketplace – economically, politically and diplomatically.

Third, he wants to improve Syria's strategic relationship with the West, rehabilitate his country and abandon bad old habits, like sponsoring international terrorism.

"He cannot afford to go on being a pariah," said the source.

Fourth, he wants not only to retrieve the Golan Heights but also to win de jure recognition from the United States and Israel for Syria's continued domination of Lebanon, where some 40,000 Syrian troops are deployed and about one million Syrian citizens now live.

Not least, said the source, Assad is ailing and wants to move quickly now to establish peace with Israel as an accomplished fact that he can leave to his son and heir-apparent, Bashar.

Assad is aware that Bashar's succession is not certain. By all accounts, the former ophthalmologist is a quick study, but he does not have his father's natural authority. He is still considered to lack the necessary political, economic and military skills, and, perhaps most important, a solid power base in the military.

Assad, says the source, has seen the peaceful succession of Jordan's King Abdullah following Hussein's death and is thought to ascribe at least some of the durability of the Hashemite throne to its powerful strategic ties to Israel.

The Week in Israel

July 5

• The brother of Eli Cohen, who was hanged in Syria in 1965 for spying on behalf of Israel, sent a letter to Syrian president Hafez al-Assad asking for permission to visit Cohen's grave.

July 6

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak assured President Bill Clinton during a phone call that he intends to implement the Wye agreement with the Palestinians.

• Avraham Burg, Labor party veteran and former head of the Jewish Agency, was elected Speaker of the Knesset.

• Peace with the Palestinians, Syria and Lebanon are of equal importance to Israel, Barak said during his inaugural parliamentary address as prime minister. His comments were viewed as an attempt to quell Palestinian fears that he will give priority to peace with Syria.

July 7

• Barak announced that he would meet with Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak on Friday and with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat on Sunday.

July 8

• Haim Ramon, newly appointed minister for Jerusalem affairs, said that he was in favor of having an Israeli Arab legislator sit on the Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee of the Knesset. Knesset Speaker Avraham Burg was among those supporting Ramon's position, with, it was believed, the tacit support of the prime minister.

• Israelis can choose between Jewish calendar or secular dating systems for inscriptions on their tombstones, the Supreme Court ruled in response to a petition on the matter.

July 9

• Wild animals in the Negev, Arava and Judean Desert are at risk due to the water shortages caused by severe draught this year. In many places in the Judean Desert, the water supplies dried up months before they normally would have.

Baycrest hosts exhibit of Judaica textile art

BY BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Torah covers in bright hues of fuchsia and orange, applique Torah ark curtains in deep blues and reds, embroidered chupahs, and hand-woven prayer shawls are all part of an exhibition of Judaica textile art by local artisan Elaine Glassman.

The exhibition, which is Glassman's first, recently opened at the Silverman Heritage Museum at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and runs until Aug. 21.

The Toronto-born Glassman, a grandmother of four, was thrilled to have her work on display.

Elaine Glassman's exhibition runs until Aug. 21

"The very exciting thing is to see everything together. I very rarely see more than one piece in my studio at a time," she said, explaining that almost all of her work is commissioned, and the pieces are sent off to clients as soon as they're completed.

Her work, on loan from religious institutions as far away as Florida and Wisconsin, filled all the display cases of the Silverman museum, which is located in the lobby of Baycrest Centre.

Glassman said she was astounded by the number of items collected. "I can't believe there is so much. I didn't think I'd have enough to fill a case."

Indeed, all the display cases were filled with an array of Torah mantles. Some are woven in brightly colored wools, while others are made with applique and and embroidery.

One of the most notable, a denim Torah cover with the story of the seven days of creation in bright applique, was designed for a Reform camp in Wisconsin, Glassman said. "It was specifically done for young people."

She pointed with pride to the colorful tallit she wove 22 years ago for her father, on the occasion of her daughter Michelle's bat mitzvah "It's been washed many times, Glassman said. "My father wears it weekly."

One of her larger projects – a model size was on display– is a chupah she made for Holy Blossom Temple in 1996. The project was commissioned by the sisterhood on the occasion of the temple's 75th anniversary.

Glassman sewed 700 leaves with silver and gold backing on to a 7½-foot square canopy made of a see-through polyester. She said she wanted the design to replicate the chupah of biblical times – the ceremony took place outdoors under a canopy of branches.

Glassman moved to a farm in Uxbridge with her husband Allan, after their four children were grown. There she has space for her weaving looms, and clients are even invited to participate in the weaving of their tallitot.

Glassman trained to be an interior designer at the Ontario College of Art, but she said she "always wanted to be a craftsperson."

She said she loves whimsical art, and along with her textiles several of her humorous papier mache figures are also on display. She recreated a scene from the old Kensington market, with a merchant complete with all his wares.

"I need some kind of expression that's just fun," she said.

Glassman, who is on the museum committee at Baycrest, was toasted in speeches of introduction by two fellow committee members, Sheila Zeldin and Anna Van Delman.

Summing up her Judaica work, Glassman said that she loves expressing joyfulness in her liturgical pieces – she uses color to "uplift the soul and spirit."

Musician arranges unique festival

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Lawrence Cherney, artistic director of Northern Encounters '99, Celebrating the Arts and Culture of the Circumpolar Nations, which runs until July 19, credits his early teenage summers at Camp White Pine for giving him his first taste of the wilderness.

This experience, he says, led him to the concept of a biennial festival, presenting Toronto with music, theatre, film, dance and visual arts from Northern Canada, Russia, Greenland, Finland, Norway and Sweden.

Born and raised in Peterborough, Ont., Cherney was introduced to music through his mother, an amateur pianist, and his father, a music lover.

At age five, Cherney began studying piano, and by his teens, he was anxious to expand his musical knowledge.

"I came home from school with a trombone under my arm, and my father suggested I ask to take the oboe, because it sounded so beautiful. As a dutiful son, I listened and that was the beginning of the end. Maybe he regrets it, because if he hadn't opened his mouth, I would have followed him into the furniture business," he says.

The budding oboist commuted to Toronto for lessons with Perry Bauman, first oboist for the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. In 1962 and '63, he went to the Interlochen Michigan Summer Music Camp, then spent the next two years playing with our National Youth Orchestra.

Having no intention of becoming a professional musician, Cherney enrolled at University of Toronto, majoring in philosophy. "After university, I realized I wanted to play oboe more than anything else. So, I went out and got a job with the National Ballet Orchestra," Cherney says.

After a two-year-stint, he joined the National Arts Centre Orchestra. By 1972, he became a founding member of the York Winds Quintet, touring North America Europe and Israel.

Since 1982, Cherney has travelled the world as a soloist, guest artist and recording artist for international radio programs and on several record labels, garnering him three Juno nominations.

In addition to his work on stage, the musician, gifted with his father's entrepreneurial streak, developed a number of ideas regarding concert programming.

According to Cherney, performing and programming are closely related, "When you perform a piece of music you are bringing something to life. When you create a program, your instrument is the program."

In 1982, Cherney established and became artistic director for Soundstreams Canada. Soundstream's mandate is "to strengthen public awareness and appreciation of contemporary Canadian music and music theatre, by commissioning, developing and producing and disseminating both Canadian and international works."

Soundstream's successful projects in Canada and internationally included Stravinsky 100th Year Celebrations, Musical Mondays at Toronto's Young Peoples Theatre,

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN, PART I

I picked up the New Yorker's Summer Fiction Issue recently, delighted to see that Nathan Englander, the 28-year-old author of the recent short story collection For the Relief of Unbearable Urges, had made it onto that magazine's list of 20 Writers for the 21st Century.

This comes as no great surprise. Englander's first published work is a fine string of pearls that has deservedly achieved a rich measure of critical acclaim.

Not since J.D. Salinger, it seems, has any offering of nine stories so enchanted critics. For reasons that will become obvious, the book should be particularly enthralling for fans of modern Jewish literature.

Englander, whose chief preoccupation is with Jewish characters and concerns, stakes out an ambitious chunk of literary territory with this debut collection. He seems to be walking a well-marked trail defined by the likes of Isaac Babel, Bernard Malamud and Isaac Bashevis Singer.

He was raised in a modern Orthodox home in New York and now lives in Jerusalem. His stories are confidently infused with biblical allusion and knowledge of Jewish law and lore, which provides the standard by which his characters interpret and judge themselves.

Paralleling the Bible narrative, the stories are arranged in a rough historical chronology. The first piece, The Twenty-Seventh Man, brilliantly focuses on a purge of 26 Yiddish writers in Stalinist Russia – actually 27, since a clerical error has placed an extra name on the list.

The bleak ironic humor here is Gogolian, veering towards the Kafkaesque. For instance: after the condemned writers are imprisoned, a guard hears a great racket and opens a peephole "to find that a symposium had broken loose."

The Twenty-Seventh man mentally composes a story in prison, supposedly a masterpiece, and recites it to his cell mates before all are executed. Englander's omniscient, all-seeing but invisible narrator alone survives to tell this wonderful Möbius strip of a tale.

In the second story, The Tumblers, Englander (like Singer before him) revisits Chelm, the legendary city of fools of Yiddish culture. Only now it is not some quaint, benign and comically backward village, but a town infested by Nazis.

On board a train, a group of Chelm Jews escapes destruction by wearing underwear and posing as circus acrobats. At one point, they flee and a gun is fired, but "only Mendel looked back at the sound of the shot; the others had learned the lessons of Sodom."

The five middle stories concern various absurd or incommensurate aspects of Jewish life in America, at least the Brooklyn suburb of Royal Hills. In Reunion, a mental patient befriends his rabbi's brother in an asylum, ultimately demonstrating his own greater humanity.

The Wig takes us into the ultra-frum reality, but ultra-romantic fantasy world of an Orthodox wig and hair salon. Here – as in The Last One Way, which concerns the plight of an agunah – Englander impresses us with his representation of the female point of view.

The Gilgul of Park Avenue introduces a mystical rabbi-cum-charlatan reminiscent of the impish rabbi in Bernard Malamud's classic story, The Silver Crown. Trouble erupts when Charles Luger, a New York gentile riding a taxi one evening, suddenly "understood he was the bearer of a Jewish soul. Ping! Like that it came. Like a knife against a glass."

If being a gentile with a Jewish soul causes major strife in one story, its corollary – a fat, bearded Jew disguised as a department-store Santa Claus – causes colossal consternation in the story Reb Kringle, whose title character loses it in front of children, parents and elves. In this piece, the irony threatens to dissolve into farce.

The last two stories, For the Relief of Unbearable Urges and In This Way We Are Wise, transport us to the promised land of Israel. An Orthodox Jerusalemite whose beloved wife won't touch him gets a rabbinical dispensation (another impish rabbi!) to see a prostitute. Afterwards he suffers so great a sense of defilement that his sexual organ feels on fire – "and yet he would not be consumed."

One reviewer, while acknowledging Englander's exceptional skill, found the final story, a first-person account of a close encounter with a terrorist bomb in Jerusalem, unworthy.

It's certainly different than the others. But what better way for Englander to round out the collection than by bringing his Jewish strife into the CNN-style present? Here, as in the first two stories, the strife is again national, rather than individualistic. And the author simultaneously broadens his range through the use of the first-person narrator.

As the New Yorker has indicated, Englander is a masterful writer who promises to play an important part in the future of American fiction – and Jewish fiction in particular.

Klezmer band is Beyond the Pale

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Student Intern

TORONTO — When Eric Stein performs with his klezmer band, he finds it gratifying to look out at the audience and spot his 90-year-old bubbie, smiling with encouragement.

"She heard this music when she was in a Polish shtetl," says Stein, 26. "She is my link to the Old World."

Stein, who plays mandolin in the band Beyond The Pale, describes the music as "swingin' gypsy klezgrass. It's klezmer and bluegrass. It's folk music in overdrive. It's hard-driving country music."

The group will be appearing at Free Times Cafe on College Street on Aug. 8 and at the Sounds in the City Concert Series at Nathan Phillips Square on Aug. 25.

Stein and two other musicians – guitarist Josh Engel and bassist Bret Higgins – started Beyond The Pale, which was originally conceived as an acoustic-oriented trio, in 1998.

Eric Stein

The group quickly developed a diverse repertoire that incorporates jazz and European ethnic folk styles.

Violinist Anne Lindsay, who has played with fiddle great Natalie McMaster, recently joined the band to round out its ethnic Jewish feel, Stein says. "There's no other band like us."

Indeed, Beyond The Pale combines klezmer, gypsy, '30s-style jazz, bluegrass and reggae to create an eclectic, energetic fusion.

Stein says many songs originate from improvisation. "We know how to build a jam to a climax. Some songs are just searing jams."

The group has played at such Toronto venues as C'est What, Hyland Theatre, Rex Hotel and The Comfort Zone, and has appeared on Citytv's Breakfast Television.

The group has also performed at bars and clubs in Montreal, Guelph, London, Brantford and Waterloo, and it will make its American debut in New York City at Calumet Arts Cafe on Aug. 27.

The band appeared at this year's DuMaurier Jazz and North by Northeast festivals, and it will also be at the KlezKanada Festival, which takes place north of Montreal Aug. 17 to 22.

Stein says he loves live performances. "It's a real rush for me." He adds that he would like to do more festivals.

He says his band will play almost anywhere, from bar mitzvahs to retirement homes. "We've played for teens to 70-year-olds."

Stein says he enjoys playing the mandolin because he finds it to be a versatile instrument which lends itself to eastern European music.

He says he is inspired by mandolin greats Dave Tarras and David Grisman, while Django Reinhardt and Stephane Grapelli inspire Beyond The Pale's energetic style. He cites Brave Old World as his favorite klezmer band.

The klezmer band has even appealed to youth. He notes that Beyond The Pale had teenage heads bobbing to the music during a March 1999 event called Coloring Ourselves: A Festival of Jewish Student Creativity.

Stein credits the students' response to "the hip edge of our music."

"There's a bias that klezmer music comes with religious baggage," he says. "But klezmer may inspire and lead someone to inner discovery."

The music of Beyond The Pale is "drenched with soul," Stein says, adding that the group plans to release its first independent CD, in early 2000.

Trinidad and Tobago heats up at Carnival time

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO — When it's Carnival time here, you can dance on the street, see spectacular shows, and parade with energetic masqueraders. But forget about sleeping!

The Republic of Trinidad and Tobago, just off the coast of Venezuela boasts an ethnically diverse population of 1.3 million predominantly African and Indian residents, in addition to some Chinese, Lebanese, Europeans and Amerindians. At Carnival time, burdens are forgotten, barriers fall, and everybody in this cultural mosaic comes together to party!

Carnival's history is as colorful as the revelers' costumes. Some trace the festival's roots to the rites of Bacchus in ancient Greece, some to its position in the Christian calendar, marking Lent, while others, emphasize the importance of the African rhythms wafting through the Carnival air.

Many believe that in the 19th century, the working population mimicked the colonial authorities' fancy balls by creating a cast of unflattering characters still seen during Carnival today.

Although Carnival's masquerading takes place on the Monday and Tuesday prior to Ash Wednesday, preparations begin months before. Local competitions held in advance use costumes that are literally one-person floats, some even created with pyrotechnics.

This nation has an abundance of artistic talent. During the days leading up to Carnival, tourists can check out the rehearsals where large steelbands beat upon transformed oil drums, or the Calypso tents that offer the singers a stage to show their soul.

Competitions are staged throughout the country with the finalists strutting their stuff at the Queen's Park Savannah. Tickets can be purchased for the King's and Queen's Semi Final Costume Extravaganza, the Junior Parade of Bands, the National Panaorama Finals and the Dimanche Gras, where competition finalists share the spotlight with Trinidad and Tobago's top musical talents, including the legendary calypsonians' Mighty Sparrow and Lord Kitchener, the reigning Calypso Monarch Singing Sandra, and star David Rudder.

Carnival is celebrated throughout the islands, but the largest fête is in Port of Spain, the capital of Trinidad. The constitution is suspended during Carnival, and all inhibitions go by the wayside.

Every year at 2 a.m., Carnival Monday begins with J'Ouvert, where thousands congregate on the street, dancing alongside a favorite floating steelband. Be forewarned this Jump Up gets messy, so wear throw-away clothes because mud and paint may be flowing in your direction.

You can enjoy Carnival as a spectator, or play band (wear a costume) and party in a mas (masquerade) camp. Through the Trinidad and Tobago Tourism Web site, one can pre-join a mas band and select a costume. The average costume costs from $150 to $250 (Cdn). The more elaborate king and queen outfits are priced from $600 to $1,000.

Onlookers can catch the thousands upon thousands adorned in the most creative of designs parade for hours and hours across the Queen's Park Savannah stage... gyrating for all to see.

Each year over 5,000 tourists come to this festival. The streets are made safe by the police and army adorned with the Star of David. This symbol of protection, borrowed from the Jewish State, is emblazoned on the uniforms' buttons and caps.

Carnival 2000 next March 5 and 6, promises to be the most spectacular to date. Hotel and airline reservations are currently being taken. Both Air Canada and BWIA fly to Trinidad. A number of hotels offer special Carnival packages.

The unspoiled island of Tobago, is the place many Carnival revelers go to recuperate. Its rainforest is the oldest forest reserve in the western hemisphere dating back to 1776. Attractions include the Botanic Gardens, Fort King George and the Tobago Museum in Scarborough.

Eco travellers will enjoy the glass bottom boat rides to the seabird sanctuaries on the offshore islands of Little Tobago and St. Giles. Island activities include snorkeling, scuba and hiking.

For information contact Trinidad and Tobago Tourism at 416-485-8724 or 1-800-535-5617, or fax 416-485-8256. The Web site is www.tidco.co.tt.

Youth lend seniors a hand as Baycrest Centre volunteers

TORONTO — Efraim Klamph, 14, wants to understand what it is like to be old.

Efraim is one of 200 youths who will volunteer in a variety of programs as a summer youth volunteer at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

"I want to understand how the elderly act and feel," says Efraim, whose mother was a youth volunteer at Baycrest in the 1960s. "And I want to help them."

At the orientation, Efraim heard a Baycrest therapeutic recreationist talk about some of the challenges older people face, such as failing health and loneliness.

The instructor asked the group of students how they would respond to a senior who can't hear what they're saying. One student replied, "get them a hearing aid," another suggested "use sign language." Efraim said, "just talk a little louder."

He participated in a sensory deprivation exercise, in which he put on ear muffs to dull his hearing, goggles to impair his eye sight, and winter mitts to reduce his grip. He then navigated a walker along the hallway.

Sylvia Klein, 92, a Baycrest resident, pushed her walker over to Efraim and squeezed his hand.

"I think the students are wonderful," she said. "Parents should teach their children to help old people and to respect them."

"We have a growing elderly population in Canada, and it's important that our youth not feel estranged from them, but interested in their well-being and in interacting with them," says Baycrest volunteer co-ordinator Sheri Jonas.

"The students gain practical job skills, develop leadership abilities and gain independence while learning firsthand the challenges facing our elderly population."

Asked if his mother encouraged him to volunteer at Baycrest, Efraim nodded, but said he didn't need much prodding.

"I want to understand the lifestyle of seniors and learn as much about them as I can."

Baycrest summer youth volunteer Efraim Klamph, 14, wearing mitts and earmuffs to impair his hand grip and hearing, uses a walker to experience what it's like to be an elderly person. Sylvia Klein, 92, who lives at the Jewish Home for the Aged, looks on.

Soy foods proving healthy

TORONTO — Soy foods likely play a key role in preventing heart disease, according to a University of Toronto (U of T) study.

The results were published in the June issue of the journal Metabolism.

Researchers were able to reduce the levels of "bad" cholesterol – while still preserving "good" cholesterol levels – in healthy middle-aged men and women by feeding them modest amounts of soy foods over two one-month periods.

"We're only beginning to understand the potentially powerful health benefits of soy," says David Jenkins, a professor of nutritional sciences at U of T and director of the risk factor modification centre at St. Michael's Hospital.

Composer celebrates God's gift of music every day

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Composer Srul Irving Glick, who is this year's composer-in-residence at the Boris Brott Spring and Summer Festival in Hamilton, sees his music as an instrument for reaching out to other people.

"Our life is a gift of God and our job here is to celebrate that gift from day to day," Glick said in a recent interview. "And my personal job is not only to celebrate my life, [but] to take the gift of music that was given to me and to share it with the world."

As he approaches his 65th birthday on Sept.18, Glick, one of Canada's most prolific and internationally acclaimed composers, a conductor and a teacher, spoke about his music and his spiritual growth despite the adversity he has faced – a traumatic shooting five years ago and his bout with cancer.

During the Brott summer festival, which presents musical programs until the end of August, Glick will host intimate and interactive explorations of his music, and speak about the influences behind it.

His works will be showcased at the festival's run-out concert, Klezmer Extravaganza, to be held at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts on July 28.

His composition, Triumph of the Spirit for Choir and Orchestra, will be featured as part of the grand finale concert, entitled The Sacred and the Profane, to be held at Hamilton Place on Aug. 21.

In addition to the festival, Glick's works will be performed in a number of different venues. On Aug. 2 and Aug. 3, Klezmer Wedding will be performed in Bonn and Ulm, Germany, with Giora Freidman as the clarinet soloist. On Oct. 24, Sing Unto the Lord a New Song, will be sung by the Amadeus Choir at the Ford Centre's Weston Recital Hall.

In addition, numerous concerts honoring Glick on his 65th birthday will be held throughout the world, and within the next few months, he will have completed two disks of his music, which will include recordings of such works as The Klezmer Wedding, The Old Toronto Klezmer Suite and his Piano Sonata.

Glick, the composer-in-residence at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, where he has been choir director since 1969, said two main influences stimulated his love of Jewish music.

His father was a chazzan, and during his teenage years, he was involved in the Zionist organization, where he learned hundreds of Israeli and Jewish folksongs and dances, he said.

The versatility of Glick's music, from chamber music to oratorio, for orchestra, vocal and choral, always with an overtone reflecting his deep and passionate love of Judaism and his belief that Judaism is a way of getting to God, integrates contemporary music, Hebraic lyricism and classical composition techniques.

While studying in Paris in 1961, Glick composed two works that reflected two of the influences in his life. Suite Hebraique No. 1 is an expression of music from Jewish life, while Sinfonia Concertante for String Quartet and String Orchestra is a contemporary western composition.

His first Canadian commission, Elegy For Orchestra, was performed by the East York Orchestra in 1964 with Milton Barnes conducting.

From 1962 to 1986, he was a producer at CBC, where his programming and recording won him seven Grand Prix du Disque awards and a Juno.

His music has brought him numerous other prizes, including the J.I. Segal Award for his contribution to Jewish music in Canada, and two gold Solomon Schecter awards for best musical program for a synagogue in North America.

In 1993, Glick received a Governor General's Medal for his contribution to Canadian culture, and in 1994, he was appointed a Member of the Order of Canada for his service to Canada and to humanity at large.

Glick said he is aware of the pain and suffering and the evil in the world. "One can see the world in darkness or turn it to see the light and beauty, with the realization that every moment is priceless."

His beliefs were tested several years ago when he was shot leaving Beth Tikvah Synagogue after a choir rehearsal.

Srul Irving Glick

"The sheer perverseness and unexpectedness of this event forced me to re-examine my deepest feelings about life and my place in it," he said.

More recently, Glick underwent eight months of chemotherapy for multiple myeloma. He said he is now in full remission.

Glick often integrates the works of poets and great scholars. For the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir's anniversary concert, Great Hymns and Anthems, he included Avinu Malkeinu and other traditional Jewish prayers, and he framed them with texts from Jeremiah, and the words of Rav Abraham Isaac Kook and Canadian poet Donia Clenman, in a translation by Rabbi Ben Zion Bokser.

He says some people dream their whole lives that they are going to do something for someone. "What I am getting back from people is much more than gratifying. I feel that I am touching people in the deepest places of their hearts and soul, and people are expressing to me their gratitude for my music."

Philanthropist donates skates to Canada Centre

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "The right tool for the right job" is a truism in the world of home repair and renovations – at least according to noted handyman and television personality, Red Green.

It turns out that Red's reliable advice applies to sporting endeavors as well.

In the gleaming Canada Centre sports and recreation complex in Metulla, Israel, for example, youngsters got their first exposure to the joys of ice skating on ramshackle rental skates that were now falling apart at the seams. Instead of firm support from their blades, they'd teeter around as if they'd just stepped off a roller coaster. No amount of duct tape, no matter how expertly applied, could rescue those old boots from the junk heap.

"It was like having a beautiful car running on bald tires," said Eli Rubenstein, director of young leadership development for UIA Federations Canada. The poor skates probably dissuaded lots of youngsters from pursuing the sport, he speculated.

Enter Canadian businessman and philanthropist, Edward Bronfman. Anxious to see young Israelis get full value from Canada Centre's skating programs, Bronfman arranged for a shipment of 20 quality CCM hockey skates and 400 durable rental skates to be delivered to Metulla. The total value of the contribution is about $18,000 US, or $4 million Canadian, Rubenstein joked.

For Bronfman, whose business interests include the giant holding company, Edper Brascan, shipping skates to Israel was far from his first involvement in Canada Centre. Several years ago, Bronfman was among a group of Canadian philanthropists who helped underwrite the renovation of the facility and the installation of an Olympic-sized skating surface. Overlooking the ice rink is the Edward and Marsha Bronfman Galleria, a restaurant constructed with funds donated by the Bronfmans.

Bronfman was in Metulla recently to tour the facility, meet old friends and view a show mounted on his behalf by Israeli figure skaters. He also met with Metulla's hockey team, said Judith Javor, personal secretary to Canada Centre chair Yossi Goldberg.

Bronfman's latest gift of skates was "for us, like a wonderful bolt from the blue," Javor said.

Over the last few years, Canada Centre has developed hockey, figure skating and short-track speed skating programs that have involved hundreds of young Israelis. It also provides recreational activities for residents of Israel's far north, and it has even led a number of regional schools to include ice skating on their phys. ed. programs, Javor said.

The gift of the new skates will make those programs even more attractive to area residents, she added.

The move to get new skates is directly traceable to a visit one year ago by David Bronfman, Edward's son. The younger Bronfman was on the last day of a 10-day mission to Israel when he decided to stop in and visit Canada Centre.

"I thought to myself, I really should skate, but the skates they had available at the rental desk were by far the worst I'd ever seen. I could barely skate in them. They were a joke, really."

On his return, Bronfman told his father about the situation and the decision was taken to upgrade the centre's stock of skates. Air Canada agreed to ship the gift free of charge and CCM provided the skates at less than wholesale price, Rubenstein said.

For David Bronfman, it was a case of seeing a need and meeting it. "People often respond to a request, but there are opportunities where people can initiate things," he said.

The kids at Canada Centre will certainly put the new skates, which were en route as The CJN went to press, to good use, Javor said.

The hockey program in Metulla has proven a success, with kids of all ages. Those under 14 and those who are older each practise three times a week. The hockey program attracts youngsters from the Golan Heights, Kiryat Shmonah, Rosh Pina and other nearby communities, she said.

They are already excited about the upcoming Roger Neilson hockey camp, which will hold its third summer training program in mid-August, she added. Organizers are hoping to accommodate 35 kids in the 14-18 range and 35 under 14. Among them are an expected 15-20 North American skaters, most of them from Canada. The Canada-Israel Experience Centre is handling their arrangements. Cost is $1,395 plus air fare. For more information, contact Rachel Lasry at 416-398-6931.

Figure skating classes have proven even more popular than hockey, with about 400 youngsters enrolled in various classes. There are also about 60 kids taking classes in short track speed skating.

Among the more adept speed skaters is Dennis Zaslavsky, an 18-year-old who finished 24th at the world championships.

Meanwhile, figure skater Misha Shmerkin is training in the United States, while Israel's world-ranked ice-dancers, Galit Chait and Sergei Sakhnovsky, also train in the United States, Javor said.

The Israeli figure skaters get to strut their stuff on home ice once a year at the Skate Israel competition in Metulla. The event, which will be held from Dec. 4 to 7, has in past years attracted some of the world's best skaters, including men's world champion Alexei Yagudin. For some reason, no North American skater has ever participated in the event, Rubenstein said.

Nevertheless, Canadian Jews continue to stand behind the residents of northern Israeli, he said.

Metulla residents have have had to cope with the area's instability. "It's a tense situation and the people in the north are feeling disheartened. The fact that we have not abandoned them is encouraging to them," Rubenstein said.

Malvern Jacobs' stormy demise

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

Malvern Jacobs kicked up more dust after he died than in all his 71 years.

His was a headline-grabbing story: Nearly 500 mourners locked out of a Jewish cemetery, standing around for two hours in the summer swelter, because the Jewishness of the deceased was in doubt. Had this ever happened before?

Came the word: Jacobs could not be buried at Pardes Shalom cemetery on June 28 because Toronto's rabbis (representing the entire religious spectrum) had decreed that he was, in fact, a Christian, even though he'd been born to Jewish parents and considered himself to be a Jew.

Confused? This may help: Jacobs was a Messianic Jew – not the kind that believes in the concept of Moshiach and tries to hasten his arrival through good works – but the kind that worships Jesus. In other words, a Christian, and a graduate of at least two evangelical Christian schools.

Spurned by Pardes Shalom, mourners took the body to York Cemetery in North York, where Jacobs was finally laid to rest.

The media reacted like sharks that had smelled a drop of blood: John Oakley of radio station CFRB excitedly went live, speaking to mourners and family members who'd encountered the closed gates at Pardes Shalom. The Motts, a husband and wife talk radio team, also on CFRB, kept the ball rolling. The National Post carried a front-page story; the Toronto Star and Sun played it inside. CTV National News interviewed "Rabbi" Jeff Forman of Thornhill's City of David, a missionizing Christian congregation, without bothering to explain Forman's credentials or what he represents.

(No one mentioned that the Canada Christian College, where Jacobs was dean of the "Department of Jewish Studies," has long been a source of pain to the Jewish community for its zealotry in missionizing to Jews.)

Only commentator Michael Coren, on his CTS-TV (cable 9) round table talk, came close to one of the central issues in this matter, when he asked panelist Paul Sheldon where and how Sheldon got his smichah (rabbinic ordination). Sheldon said he couldn't recall.

Sheldon is a long-time associate of Aaron Zimmerman, spiritual leader of Toronto's Beth Meyer Congregation, on Sheppard Avenue. They are members of the Association of Independent Rabbis, whose handful of members do not belong, and never have, to either the Toronto Board of Rabbis or the Vaad Harabanim.

I bring this up because it was Zimmerman who officiated at Jacobs' funeral service at Steeles College Memorial Chapel, and it was through his congregation that Jacobs came to claim a plot at Pardes Shalom. Jacobs, as it turns out, belonged to Beth Meyer for years, along with about 25 other family members, all of whom are entitled to plots at Pardes Shalom through their membership.

How did a Christian minister come to belong to a synagogue, even one on the fringes? Jacobs joined the tiny shul in the mid-1980s, Zimmerman told The CJN. Asked whether he knew his congregant worshiped Jesus, Zimmerman said, "no, I did not discuss it with him at all." Jacobs, was, according to Zimmerman, a "baal tshuvah" – someone who has returned to God. Which God, he didn't say.

What steams Zimmerman more than his late congregant's religious stylings is the fact that Toronto's rabbis did not notify him of the controversy.

"I wasn't notified," Zimmerman protested. "I didn't know anything about it. They [the rabbis] should have called me and said, 'Zimmerman, don't officiate at this funeral because the man [was] Christian.' If I knew, I wouldn't have gone to the funeral.

"The rabbonim, they made a boo-boo, they made a big mistake by not letting Zimmerman know. What are they, so stuck up? Who the hell are they? They are next to God?"

So a rabbi who is outside the mainstream officiates at the funeral of a self-described Jew who is actually a Christian, which the rabbi would not have done had he known the truth about his own congregant of some 15 years.

It's indeed a topsy-turvy world.
